Soviet Denies Chemical Spying; Subject May Arise at Stromi

MOSCOW - The Soviet Union on Thursday rejected as absurd the U.S. charge that KGB agents had been using an invisible powder to track employees of the U.S. Em-bassy and other U.S. agencies.

But in Los Angeles, a presiden-tial spokesman said the issue was a serious one that was likely to come up at the November meeting in Geneva between President Ronald Reagan and the Soviet leader, Mik-

Witnesses described scenes of what they called "mass panic."

It appeared that almost all of those killed had been sitting in the rear section of the airliner.

The plane belonged to British Airtours, a subsidiary of British Airways, the state-owned national carrier. Officials of the company said that a fire had broken out in the port engine just as the plane was about to lift off and that an

One reason for the pessimism is that the administration is still rent over an arms control policy.

A split exists between Pentagon officials and officials in the State Department and White House over a trade-off that would limit Mr. Reagan's plan for a space shield against missiles in exchange for deep cuts in Soviet missiles.

If the disputes are not reconciled, officials said, it may be impossible to reach any agreement with Mr. Gorbachev on reducing quelear arsenals. But, the officials added, an effort will be made to forge a consensus by a summit planning group to be presided over by the national security affairs adviser, Robert C. McFarlane, and the White House chief of staff, Donald T. Regan.

White House officials said the signals to Moscow this week were prompted by differing demands and events within the administration. Each was accompanied by a thetorical-challenge, including the disclosure that the Soviet Union had used possibly harmful chemispace target, a project the Soviet Union has tried to stop. The presidential spokesman. Larry Speakes, said the test was necessary to counter a "clear threat" from Soviet programs.

On Wednesday, the White House responded to Soviet use of chemical substances against Americans in Moscow by accusing the Kremlin of letting its military and security services "act as if they are under no control."

Drug War: British Seek Right Language

By Karen DeYoung

LONDON - On screen, a healthy-looking boy of 17 stands cockily, one hand on his hip. "Heroin," he says. "I dunno why there's all this fuss about it. It might be a problem for some people, but I could handle it.

The scene dissolves into others. with the boy looking scruffer and sicker. As his speech deteriorates, he claims, "There's no way I'm going to become an addict."

Finally, he is sitting on the floor of an empty room, his body hunched and sweating. "Look, I've got this thing under control. I've just got a touch of the flu today. That's all." His voice is barely audible. "I could give it up tomorrow. Couldn't I?"

This and another similar commercial, featuring a girl, are being shown on television programs fa-vored by teen-agers. Along with a series of advertisements in teen magazines, it is part of a costly. controversial campaign warning young Britons against heroin.

The government has allocated nearly $20 million to combat a fastspreading drug problem that has seen nearly a tripling of heroin users since 1979.

Once limited to several hundred addicts centered in London, heroin use now has become so common in schoolyards and neighborhoods throughout the country that Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher has warned it threatens to "undermine a whole generation."

The publicity campaign has been tailored for teen-agers. But the overall anti-drug offensive is comprehensive, targeted at the sources of the drug and its domestic traffickers as well as its users.

British officials, who see the United States as the pacesetter both in illegal drug use and the fight against it, have consulted closely with their U.S. counterparts in planning strategy.

The government has begun stationing customs officers in countries that are primary sources of beroin, like Pakistan, and it is contributing money abroad to encour- list. I can't give you an appointage substitution of poppy crops by ment. The receptionist will write to Britain even has a celebrity antidrug crusader. After Diana, the Princess of Wales, appeared on a British Broadcasting Corp. televi-sion special last month urging adolescents to swear off drugs, phone calls by anxious parents to a hotline jammed national circuits.

Drug treatment clinics agree that publicity and education programs have raised public concern and en-

Most of those turned away, he said, do not come back.

Officials are prepared to ac-knowledge that Britain's 13.5 percent unemployment rate has been a factor in the spread of drug abuse. But while beroin addiction has grown by quantum leaps in poor areas such as Hackney and the city of Liverpool, it is by no means limited to lower economic strata.

There are a lot of other variables," including Britain's histori-cally relaxed attitude toward drugs, said an official from the Home Office, which has responsibility for law enforcement and drug probcouraged willingness among some lems. There is evidence that availablity is important, too."

that Mrs. Thatcher's overall clampdowns on public spending has meant that there is little real help to offer. So far, the government has offered about $16 million for pump-priming of local treatment units over a three-year period.

"I have to be fair to this govern-ment and say that it is the first that has handed out so much money, said Jeff Boyd, a social worker at the Hackney Hospital Drug Dependency Unit in London. "But on the other hand, it's not much money, and we have a drug problem of Ideally, Mr. Boyd said, anyone requesting treatment should be seen and placed within eight days. "This morning," he said in an interview, "I had to say to somebody, Well, we have a hell of a waiting

Research by the Home Office among parents, professionals and youths, however, led to the conclusion that teen-agers "aiready were very aware of drugs, but often not very well-informed," the official said.

In overruling the advisory group, the Home Office went to Yellowhammer, London's trendiest youth-market ad agency, to comission anti-heroin messages. Yellowhammer decided that what Britain did not need was a campaign patterned on U.S. advertisements, using "scare tactics" like the threat of imprisonment. Teenagers, said the Yellowhammer director, Sammy Harari, "see people around them smoking heroin, exhibiting all the positive aspects of it and none of the negative ones. If you say, 'Take heroin and you'll become a junkie and die,' they won't believe it."

"Among the other theories we developed," he continued, "is that there is no such thing as a pusher" to warn against. The person who introduces most youths to heroin usually "is a friend." "And it is he added.

Mr. Harari traveled to Liverpool to interview inner-city youths and found that "kids are very sophisticated, but they are illiterate... and completely inarticulate. Long words like, 'Heroin will make you impotent,' didn't work. They didn't know the word."

So the warnings focus on the 'sliding slope" of usage, from initial apparent harmlessness to evenproblems not easily avoided even by the most careful user, from skin problems to addiction.

In searching for the correct messenger, Mr. Harari rejected rock stars, because "kids simply don't believe that a pop star tells them not to take drugs, and then doesn't walk around the corner and do two lines of coke," Similarly, he discarded the Princess Diana approach. "Having Princess Di saying, 'Don't take drugs, is about as realistic," he said, "as having Nancy Reagan saving 'Don't take drues. The completed print and video

"Originally, we suspected that the whole campaign was designed for vote getting," he added alluding to Mrs. Thatcher's white. conservative constituency.

Mr. Harari said the message creators told the government it had to agree to a couple of conditions that the messages would be placed "underground," meaning on teen programs and in magazines where they would be invisible to the average parent or voter.

And, Mr. Harari acknowledged, in the process of focusing on the dangers of heroin, the advertise-

Bureaucrats balked, so Mr. Harari took it to government ministers. The campaign was approved, and the messages began this spring.

Reagan Reportedly Got A Warning on Lebanon

By Bill Keller

New York Times Service WASHINGTON - The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff told a House committee investigating the 1983 truck-bombing of the marine garrison at the Beirut airport that the military chiefs had unanimously advised President Ronald Reagan against deploying marines in Lebanon in the first place, according to a committee

A transcript of the classified hearings by the House Armed Services Committee was made public Wednesday, with most references to the Joint Chiefs' advice cense at the Pentagon's insistence.

But one member of the panel, Representative Larry J. Hopkins, a Republican of Kentucky, filled in details of a censored exchange with General John W. Vessey Jr., chairman of the Joint Chiefs, in which. according to Mr. Hopkins, the general said the Joint Chiefs had opposed the use of the marines.

In a telephone interview from Kentucky, Mr. Hopkins said: That is very definitely my recollection. The conclusion was unanimous at that time among the Joint Chiefs that we should not be there under these circumstances."

He was unable to explain, however, why the gate through which the truck sped was open at the time of the attack or why it was customarily left open.

Colonel Geraghty was one of two marine officers to receive mild reprimands as a result of the bombing. The two officers received letters of instruction that were not to be retained in their files.

For the same reason, he said, anti-tank rockets, which might have prevented the terrorist's truck from reaching the barracks, were not kept ready at the gates to the compound.

Mexican Says Sandinist Overthrow Would Destabilize Latin America

By Richard J. Meislin

New York Times Server MEXICO CITY - Mexico's foreign minister has criticized sentiment that favors the overthrow of the Sandinist government of Nicaragua. Such action, he said, would have "very unfortunate conse-quences" for Latin America.

The foreign minister, Bernardo Sepúlveda Amor, was responding to a report that some Reagan administration officials had said U.S. differences with Nicaragua could not be resolved as long as the Sandinists were in power.

"We do not believe that the solution is by way of the removal of a legitimately constituted government," Mr. Sepúlveda said.

He added that forceful overthrow could bring a "possible rup-ture of the institutional order and legitimate systems of security," not only in Central America but also in other regions of Latin America.

The foreign minister made his remarks two days before he was to leave for a meeting in Cartagena, Colombia, of Latin American forcign ministers.

The meeting is to be the first between the so-called Contadora nations - Mexico, Colombia, Panama and Venezuela - and a support group that has been created to show wider support for the Contadora group. The support group consists of Argentina, Brazil, Peru and Uniguay.

■ Rebel Funds Tax-Exempt

A leading group raising funds for Nicaraguan rebels obtained federal tax-exempt status three years ago after pledging never to provide "materiel or funds" to insurgents, according to Internal Revenue Ser vice documents. The Associated Press reported from Washington.

Now, however, the group, the U.S. Council for World Freedom, claims credit for funneling tens of thousands of dollars in aid to the rebels fighting to overthrow Nica-ragua's leftist government.

Retired Major General John K. Singlaub, council chairman, said this week that he was not familiar with the commitment made to the IRS by the group's treasurer, "I suppose I should be," he said.

General Singlaub and other council officials say funds collected in the United States were used only to buy the rebels nonlethal supplies to avoid violating U.S. neutrality and arms export laws. Money to buy weapons for the rebels was raised elsewhere, they said.

Wilson Fadely, an IRS spokesman, said the council's tax-exempt status was granted "based upon the information provided to us" and could be revoked if a group is "not

Harbin Expecting Soviet Trade

Chinese City Stands to Gain From End of Border Dispute

By Daniel Southerland

Washington Past Service HARBIN, China — Once considered part of a front line bracing for a possible attack from the Soviet Union, the city of Harbin now appears to face potential benefits from increased Chinese-Soviet

No one talks much any more about the deep air-raid shelters built under Harbin following border clashes with the Russians 16 years ago. Some sections of the underground labyrinth of tunnels and shelters seem to be falling into disrepair. According to a recent issue of the China Daily newspaper, the port of Aihui located on the Soviet border north of Harbin is to be "drastically expanded" to accommodate increased trade with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

About six weeks ago, a Chinese provincial delegation met in Blagoment signed in Moscow last month. But while the old hostility toward the Soviet Union appears to have subsided, in Harbin at least it does not seem to have been replaced by any great enthusiasm for doing business with the Russians. Officials in Harbin sometimes indicated they would now prefer to see Western nations rather than the Soviet Union bring in new technology, trade, and investment. U.S. technology, in particular, appears to be highly prized, where-veshchensk on the Soviet side of the as Soviet technology is considered Hellong River opposite Aihui and primitive. Corp., which helped to build a large electrical power generator here, seems to have impressed Chinese officials with its technological capabilities.

An industrial center of nearly three million people, Harbin is the major Chinese city situated closest to the Soviet border. Developed as a railroad center by late 19th century Russia, it grew from a fishing village to a city of more than 100,000 European residents.

A war memorial to Soviet troops who fought the Japanese here toward the end of World War II also recalls a second wave of Russian influence. After the war, the Soviet Union beloed to design and build: 22 factories in Harbin. The new agreement signed in Moscow callsfor Soviet cooperation in modern-izing 17 factories built in China-with Soviet aid in the mid-1950s Only three of those factories are reported to be located in Harbin.

Zhu Yaosheng, director of Harbin's city economic committee, said that the Chinese want to compare. terms offered by various compa-nies; before deciding who should carry out certain parts of the modemization. He said that Japanese and West German firms had shown

Moreover, the province trans-portation network is limited in its ability to cope with greatly expanded Chinese-Soviet trade. The Soviet Army dismantled the railroad line when it withdrew from Manchuria following the victory over Japan in World War II.

What is certain is that the atmospherics of the relationship with the Russians has greatly improved. In one small sign of a thaw. Chinese trained by the Russians no longer have anything to fear from demonstrating their Russian language

Falwell's Amoral Minority

As South Africa crackles with violence, American debate over the impending tragedy seems somehow lost in last year's headlines. The Reverend Jerry Falwell of the Moral Majority rushes to speak on behalf of an amoral minority, proffering indecencies to comfort the oppressors in the name of anti-Commu-nism. People offended by apartheid are locked in stale argument about economic sanctions.

The U.S. government, peeking through the tatters of its policy of "constructive engagement," cannot decide which side it is on. One day it warns white Afrikaners they are heading for the abyss. The next, it reproaches Bishop Desmond Tutu, the soul of black moderation. All three responses are obsolete; none serve either America's interest or Americans' altruism. Surely it is time to weigh another approach. Call it affirmative involvement.

Of the voices in this debate, Mr. Falwell's is the most embarrassing. How elegant and in-formed his description of the bishop: "a phony." He claims President P.W. Botha told him that apartheid is "wrong" - just days after Mr. Botha reaffirmed its principles in a defiant speech. And Mr. Falwell extols the Pretoria regime as an anti-Communist friend of the West - as if that excused a racial tyranny whose offenses are a windfall for Moscow.

If Mr. Falwell's ideas fail on grounds of decency, a different problem is posed by sanctions and disinvestment. They are surely well motivated, meant to coerce South Africa's rulers to relax their racial oppression. But while Americans have been arguing about whether to apply sanctions and which ones, Pretoria has been tightening its grip. Mr. Botha has calculated the pain, and finds it bearable. tinue. People contend that disinvesting from companies doing business in South Africa will help bring Pretoria to its knees, and senses. Gestures like that have symbolic value, and make Americans feel better. But hand-washing is as inadequate as the administration's evident policy of hand-wringing.

"Constructive engagement" was sold as the way to produce concessions through quiet sure. The idea was that Washington could coax Pretoria into multiracial bargaining. The depressing reality is that Pretoria will not bargain, not even with Bishop Tutu until he disavows civil disobedience, the only nonviolent recourse available to blacks. But instead of assailing this demeaning condition, the admin-istration faults the bishop for declining to join a delegation that met with Mr. Botha. "Constructive engagement has wrested nothing from Pretoria — while costing the United States dearly. Washington is now perceived by blacks as Mr. Botha's apologist and partner.

South Africa's six million whites are scarcely monolithic. They care deeply what America and other Western societies think. So do the 23 million blacks. It ought to be Washington's minimum purpose to build credibility with every side. Instead of correcting a pillar like the bishop, let it reproach an interloper named Mr. Falwell, Instead of sparring about simplisms like disinvestment, let it promote a web of contacts with South Africans of all colors by students, lawyers, unionists and others. Tragedy in South Africa may be inevitable and America's leverage limited. At least let it become honestly constructive.

- THE NEW YORK TIMES.

Hazards of Defense Buildup

The Pentagon has reached a point in the defense buildup that administration officials used to deny would occur. It is increasingly clear that the buildup has been underpriced. The defense budgets now projected, large as they are, will not buy all the weapons the planners earlier said they would. The services are having to choose; there is growing pressure on the weaker weapons that they want. A classic example is DIVAD, the Army's new radar-controlled divisional air defense gun.

To accompany its tanks in battle, the Army wants 614 of these guns (the current cost estimate for which is $4.2 billion), and has already ordered 146, of which 50 have been delivered. The orders were placed before the weapon was fully tested, under a procedure intended to save time. The procedure would have been line had DIVAD then passed the tesis. Unfortunately it has not. The radar has been misled, the gun has not been quick enough and it also has jammed.

Last year the administration requested and Congress approved purchase of the next 117 DIVADs, but Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger took the unusual step of holding up the expenditure, pending further testing. That has now been done, and Mr. Weinberger is scheduled to announce a buy-or-not-buy decision before Sept. 30, the end of the fiscal year.
The Army and DIVAD's manufacturer,

Ford Aerospace, a division of Ford Motor Co., both say the gun did well in its further tests this year. The most dramatic though not necessarily most important of these was a live-fire exercise in June. Ford has put about a paper saying that in this exercise the weapon "destroyed six of seven high-performance aircraft and three of three helicopters presented." But a cochairman of Congress's self-styled Military Reform Caucus and a critic of DIVAD, Representative Denny Smith (Republican of Oregon), says this is misleading. It sounds as if DIVAD was offered 10 targets in realistic circumstances and shot down nine. In fact weapons experts say such tests tend to be less realistic than they sound, because of the cumbersomeness of the drone aircraft involved. There were also many more than 10 flybys in the test - 32 "presentations," the Army says, and not all the claimed kills are clear. The test used proximity rounds, which are meant to disable planes by bursting near them. The three helicopters were felled by these bursts, the Army says, and two of the fixed-wing aircraft. The other four fixed-wing targets that Ford said were destroyed were actually "command destructed" by the range safety officer; he blew them up when the proximity rounds did not bring them down right away. No one knows whether the bursts from the rounds themselves would have brought them down. The Army already has several other weapons to protect forward units against air attack (and the Air Force has still more; that is one of its main jobs). But the Army says the weapons it has are not good enough to meet the envisioned threat, and that it will need either DIVAD, on which it has already spent about $1.5 billion, or a comparable weapon. Spokes-men also warn against holding DIVAD or any complex modern weapon to too high a standard too early in its life cycle. The spokesman also say teething problems must be expected.

The trouble with these kinds of arguments is that they are open-ended; they leave no way to say no. DIVAD is a costly weapon, the need for which is not completely clear and in whose performance no one can have great confidence on the record so far. The Army may need more protection for its tanks, but Mr. Weinberger needs even more to impart a sense of discipline and credibility to the procurement process. A decision to buy DIVAD would take him in the opposite direction. DIVAD has become a symbol. If it can pass muster in its present state, the message is that any weapon can.

- THE WASHINGTON POST.

Other Opinion

Peace Effort Going Nowhere

At the urging of King Hussein of Jordan, the United States agreed to involve itself in talks aimed at trying to revive the Middle East peace process. But Assistant Secretary of State Richard Murphy - after conferring in Jordan. Israel and Egypt — has little if anything to show for his trouble. The central problem is that the United States and Jordan do not agree on what the talks should lead to.

Jordan wants the United States to meet with a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. The Palestine Liberation Organization and Jordan say they would regard such a meeting as constituting U.S. recognition of the PLO. But U.S. policy is still not to deal with the PLO until it at least implicitly accepts Israel's legitimacy by endorsing a couple of key U.N. Security Council resolutions. The recent Arab summit conference showed how divided the Arab world is when it comes even to a political settlement with Israel. Though they boycotted the event, radical states led by Syria still were able to exercise a coercive veto and prevent any en-dorsement of King Hussein's initiative.

All this is welcome news to many in Israel, since it again postpones the day of reckoning that would come if the deeply split Israeli government was ever confronted with a plausible opportunity to negotiate a territorial com-promise on the West Bank. Because the Arabs are not ready to get serious about peace based on territorial compromise, the Israelis have been spared the need to get serious, too.

FROM OUR AUG. 23 PAGES, 75 AND 50 YEARS AGO

1910: Nicaraguan President Resigns NEW ORLEANS - Advices from Managua declare President Madriz has resigned the Presidency of Nicaragua and named Senor Jose Estrada, brother of the insurgent leader, as his successor. Mr. Estrada has issued a proclamation turning over the government to the insurgents. It is stated that the rioting at Managua is most serious and that two persons have been killed and many are leaving, while the American residents are apprehensive. The revolutionists are reported to be 12 miles outside the capital. The State Department in Washington confirms the news of the victory of General Estrada's troops in Nicaragua. Crowds parade the streets crying "Death to the Yankees!" The American Legation and Consulate are crowded. The United States cruisers Vicksburg and Yorktown are at Corinto.

1935: Japanese Cotton Disturbs U.S. WASHINGTON - Continuance of cotton processing taxes despite their questionable constitutionality, and a "friendly agreement" with Japan to limit dumping of cheap Japanese cotton textiles in the United States are recommended in a report of the Cotton Textile Committee which President Roosevelt submitted to Congress [on Aug. 22]. The committee urged continuance of the processing taxes during "the economic emergency," but rejected a proposal for a subsidy for American cotton textile exporters. The committee found that the domestic market has been disturbed by recent exports of cotton textiles from Japan, and added: "Although Japanese exports to the United States have been in small proportion to American production, there has been a sudden and unusual increase in certain cloths."

Japan Must Take Steps to End Free Ride on Defense

Walliamsburg economic summit the industrial democracies issued a joint statement that included the following assertion: "The security of our countries is indivisible and must be approached on a global basis." This was a historic milestone.

For the first time it was recognized that the security of Western Europe, Japan and the North Pacific are inex-tricably intertwined. Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone deserves praise for recognizing this fact, as do the Japanese people for showing the po-litical maturity that behooves a truly great power. In the context of these relationships it is only appropriate that Japan should play a more impor-tant role in international security.

Japanese efforts have been steadily rowing. The current five-year de ense program increases defense spending significantly, and will im-prove Japan's security position. But apan still spends a disproportionatey low amount compared with other Western powers, both per capita and in terms of the portion of gross national product spent on defense.

While Americans spend 3 percent of GNP, and Western Europe's major powers spend 2.8 percent to 5.3 per-cent, Japan keeps its defense budget at just under I percent. South Korea, from whose security Japan benefits. spends 7.5 percent on defense. The average American spends about $1,050 per year, and the average Briton, Frenchman and West German spends $375, $270 and $260 each. Yet the Japanese spend only about $100 per capita on defense.

This imbalance is the result of the arbitrary "I percent of GNP" ceiling placed on defense spending, but it is interesting to note that, for many years before the budget ceiling was declared, Japanese defense expenditures stood well above this arbitrarily set figure, reaching as high as 2.9 percent in 1952. This is inequitable, and does not do justice to the global role that Japan should be assuming

At the same time, it would be a mistake for the United States to pressure Japan to increase its defense spending dramatically. A concern both for internal political stability and the sensitivities of Japan's neigh-bors counsel Americans to urge only a gradual but steady increase in the Japanese defense budget. The feelings of the Japanese people against militarism deserve our respect; they are the product of painful historical experience. Unilateral American statements pressing Japan to double or triple its defense budget in order to bring it closer to the spending levels sustained by the United States or our West European allies will only intensify existing antagonisms. And con-gressional resolutions, such as the reBy Zbigniew Brzezinski be "strongly encouraged" to complete efforts toward acquiring "thou-sand-mile self-defense capabilities by the end of the decade," are inappropriate and counterproductive.

Japan will move in this direction on its own, as a natural outgrowth of its global status and growing interna-tional stature. The Japanese realize that regional stability cannot be sus-tained only on the basis of U.S. commitments, and that Japan must play a larger role in making the region's multilateral security arrangements.

In the interim, when Japan's de-fense effort remains markedly lower than the rest of the West, it can make an indirect but vital contribution to common security by increasing its strategic economic aid to developing countries whose defense is vital to the interests of the Western democracies. Egypt, the Sudan, Thailand, the Philippines and Pakistan are among those key countries, and in 1983 Japan gave them a total of $803 million in economic aid. Another $208.5 million went to South Korea, and in 1984 Japan allocated more than $1 billion of aid to the Philippines. These sums should be considered as cent one asserting that Japan needs to part of Japan's defense contribution. But, given the vital health of Jaan's economy, it is appropriate for the United States and Europe to expect that the total proportion of the Japanese GNP devoted to its own direct defense and strategic economic aid designed to enhance our collective security should be approximately 4 percent — which would still be much less than the percentage of GNP expended purely on defense by the United States, and approximately equivalent to the level for the major countries of Western Europe. This means that, over a three-year period, Japan should increase its combined defense and strategic-aid programs by about $12 billion a year, and these resources should be channeled not only to the present recipistates in which we share a common strategic interest: Central America, because of the Panama Canal, through which much of Japan's trade flows under U.S. protection. This would help us cope with a serious security problem in a region vital to us, just as we help to assure Japan's security in the Far East and regions critical to Japan, such as the Gulf.

A Japanese contribution of such an amount to our common defense would be an appropriate action, and would reduce charges that Japan is getting a free ride. Accordingly, it should be an urgent goal of the Japanese to reach such a 4-percent level within the next three years. Spread over this period, the annual incremental increases would be only I percent of GNP, reaching in three years the approximate total of $50 billion a year allocated for Japan's (and America's) collective security.

Moreover, such aid should be allocated deliberately for strategic pur-A Japanese contribution of such an cated deliberately for strategic pur-poses, and not merely as a means to enhance Japan's trade. And it should be dispersed through close geopolitical and security consultations among Japan, the United States and other Williamsburg participants — though

Japan would obviously retain the Japan would obviously relain the right of ultimate decision.

While this figure might seem excessive to many Japanese, U.S. friends should consider that the current American defense budget is $284 billion, even though GNP is only twice that of Japan. The current Japanese expenditure on defense is about 20 times less: the proposed collection times less: the proposed collective security budget would still be about six times less, even though Japan's GNP is half that of the Umited Stites. Furthermore, the U.S. general-pur-ose forces dedicated to the protection of the Far East (not counting the strategic forces that also protect la-pan) account directly for more than $40 billion a year. The proposed fig-ure for the overall Japanese defense and strategic aid budget would be about equal in GNP terms to the burden now carried by Britain, France or West Germany on defense alone — but absolutely and relatively much less than by the United States Japanese hysteria could become a dominant theme in American poli-

Thus, with the likelihood that antitics, and the danger that this carries for our wider political relations, it is imperative that our shared interests in global security be more emphatically asserted, and that tangible steps be taken toward those ends.

Tokyo Seeks New Technologies From Arms Research

GENEVA — By a strange coincidence Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone of Japan visited Europe just as representatives of 17 European governments assembled for the first time in Paris to discuss Eureka, a French-sponsored project for European technological cooperation. Not surprisingly, Japan had not been invited to this gathering: not only because it is not part of Enrope but because Eureka is conceived to become a way to counter Japanese technological competition in addition to answer President Ronald Reagan's Strategic Defense Initiative.

Japan is a world leader in many fields of advanced technology. So far, most of it is in the civilian sector. But the dividing line between civilian and military application is getting thinner all the time: The electronic revolution is bringing Japan ever closer to arms-related production. A recent study by Dr. Reinhard Drifte, assistant director of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London and a specialist on Japan and the Far East, shows the delicate relationship between the two, with the arms industry gaining gradually but steadily in importance.

The study, "Japan's Growing Arms Industry" concludes that "the greatest lure for Japan's industry to launch into the production of arms is the prospect of gaining new technologies through arms-related Research and Development (parily state-funded), and of finding a wider application for their most advanced civilian technology ... " The driving force in this process is the United States. Thus, Japan figures prominently on the list of those Western industrialized countries which the U.S. administration invited to participate in the SDI research programs: Japan's industry and technological performance are of considerable in-terest, particularly in those fields expected to become relevant in connection with space-based weapon systems. The Japanese, in turn, see a considerable advantage in such cooperation with the United States: It promotes their efforts toward building up a more autonomous arms industry and broadens the technological basis of industry. Arms procurement is being considered from the perspective as to how it might benefit the civilian sector:

By Curt Gasteyger

With Europeans still debating the strategic and political implications of SDI, Japan has shown an interest in joining the SDI research program, although Mr. Nakasone has stopped short of its full endorsement. Japan's arms industry proper is still relatively small, its annual sales in 1980 amounting to a mere $3 billion. The reasons for this are obvious. There is still a widespread reluctance to become a major arms producer, there is the small size of the Japanese "Self-Defense Forces" and there is the prohibition of arms exports.

Such limitations have, however, not prevented the formation of what Dr. Drifte calls "at least a potential military-industrial complex." It is, at present, not so much the size of annual sales or the share of arms-related production out of total production which matters. Rather, it is the fact that the biggest, most important companies in Japan (from Mitsubishi Heavy Industries to Kawasaki and Toshiba) have a stake in arms production and good access to the political leadership. good access to the political leadership.

As a industries are conceived as complementing civilian industries. This is important because as negotiations on the 1983 agreement on export of Japanese inditary technology to the United States have shown. Japan suspects that America is merely interested in acquiring more easily high technology from Japan via the channel of "military exports" Japan also fears that by sharing technology with a U.S. arms producer, the technology could be made classified, preventing its application in other fields.

Whereas in the civilian sector Japan has reached a high degree of technological maturity, it is still backward in key arms technologies. The attraction of major technological advances here will no doubt come from participation in such projects as SDI. It is from this kind of venture in the armament field that Japanese companies draw the greatest gains for their advances in other sectors of industry.

The message from all this is that Japan's many interest in arms technology is prompted less by a concern for defense and grand strategy than by the country's determination to further promote its competitiveness in high technology in general. But it would appear that this message has not yet arrived on the other side of the Pacific.

New Right Wages War On Shultz

By Arnold Sawislak

WASHINGTON — Richard Viguerie, a New Right funare out to get George Shultz fired. Most put this latest crusade in the fat chance category, but dismissing the secretary of state may be a guise for the real purpose of the campaign.

Mr. Viguerie has just sent out a letter "for this nationwide grassroots effor to change the direction of American foreign policy."

Included in the mailing is a list of 25 reasons Mr. Shultz should be dismissed, including six examples of "terrorism or other acts of warfare" against the United States, including the recent TWA hijacking, which have been answered by threats of U.S. retaliation but no action.

"People are sick and tired of this country being pushed around by two-bit hijackers and communist pup-pets," Mr. Viguerie wrote.

Some of the charges against Mr. Shultz are general: He has "sought to impose a mindless orthodoxy on State Department of Figital by State Department officials by purging those who disagree with the For-eign Service establishment" and has "systematically excluded people with a common-sense view of international affairs from important jobs in the foreign policy apparatus."

Others are more specific: He lobbied in favor of continued observance of the SALT-2 treaty, supported more than $250 million in aid to the Marxist government of Zimbabwe, opposed establishment of Radio Marti broadcasting anti-Castro pro-paganda to Cuba, backed the Contadora natious' proposals for Central America "which would have legitimized the Soviet colony in Nicaragua," supported the so-called Geno-cide Treaty and refused to acknowledge Soviet treaty violations so as not to damage the prospects for more treaties with the Soviets. The list of sins suggests that even those who believe Mr. Shultz is a rotten secretary of state would have to concede he has been a busy one. Such a list of transgressions, which literally includes errors of judgment or policy in five continents, might also raise the question: How could President Ronald Reagan have failed to notice that his secretary of state was committing so many outrages against American interests?

One possible answer is that he did not and that Mr. Shultz is doing what

Mr. Reagan wants. That assumes that Mr. Reagan knows what is going on in his own administration and if so, then the arrows Mr. Viguerie et al have launched at Mr. Shultz really are aimed at the president and his conduct of foreign policy.

As to the outcome, Mr. Viguerie calls the campaign against Mr. Shultz the most urgent issue "since our light against the Panama Canal treaties." Those who receive the letters asking for $100 contributions may recall who won that fight.

The World Does Not View the U.S. as a Weakling

WASHINGTON — America's New Right has indulged in some heavy Reagan-bashing recently over the administration's response to international terrorism.

It asserts that failure to take reprisals for, and perhaps pre-empt, specific acts of anti-American terrorism, such as the hijacking of the TWA flight and the killing of U.S. military personnel in El Salvador and West Germany, signals a great national weakness. That in turn is said to undermine the image of America's resolve and destroy the credibility of its capacity to use force.

By extension, pernicious American inaction allegedly contaminates other national interests — principally relations with the Soviet Union, which are at the heart of the New Right's current discontent with the Reagan administration. The New Right ar-gues that refusal to react forcefully to terrorist acts will be interpreted in Moscow as a sign of increasing soft-

Moscow as a sign of increasing sort-ness in American policies.

This line of reasoning contains ba-sic errors about international politics, errors concerning the way the United States is perceived by those meant to be influenced by force, and with the utility of force to achieve policy ends. Americans who believe that the in-ternational community (including the Soviet Union) views the United States as a bashful, reluctant protago-nist, unwilling to use military force to protect its interests, are taking little

Ezra Pound: Living by the Word

by Alan Levy.

ZRA Loomis Pound, author of "The Cantos" as well as "Jefferson and/or Mussolini," was born a century ago Oct. 30 in Hailey, Idaho, a few miles from Kethum, where his friend Ernest Hemingway ended his life in 1961. It was Hemingway who wrote early on:

"Any poet born in this century or in the last ten years of the preceding century who last ten years of the preceding century who can bonestly say he has not been influenced by or learned greatly from the work of Ezra Pound deserves to be pitied rather than rebuked. It is as if a prose writer born in that time should not have learned from or been influenced by James Joyce or that a traveler should pass through a great blizzard and not have felt its cold or a sandstorm and not have felt the sand and the wind. The best of Pound's writing — and it is in the 'Cantos' — will last as long as there is any literature."

Hemingway did not overstate his case. Ezra Pound lived by the word (and almost died on the gallows) to become a classic (and pariah) in his lifetime. Since his death in Venice on Nov. 1, 1972, two days after his 87th birthday, Pound's stock has stayed steadily high on the literary exchange with few of the fluctuations that affect the posthumous value of contemporaries he championed, such as T. S. Eliot, Robert Frost, and William Carlos Williams.

Pound began his eastward odyssey as a boy by moving to Philadelphia when his father, Homer, was named assistant assayer of the United States. Just as the very name Pound had monetary significance, his boy-bood background had some bearing on the economic theories that led him to be tried on 19 counts of treason for his World War II

At the U.S. Mint, the boy saw - and remembered - people bringing in "goldbricks" peddled by swindlers, that proved to be gilded lead . . . workmen telling visitors who inquired about free samples that "you're welcome to keep this bag of gold if you can carry it away," which proved impossible, and, after the 1892 Presidential election, "silver I saw, as no Aladdin, for when, [Grover] Cleveland was elected, there was the recount of four-million in the Mint vanits, the bags had rotted, and the men halfnaked with open gas flares, shoveled it into the counting machines, with a gleam on tarnished discs." By the time he was seven, keep up with their genteel neighbors on a civil servant's salary — that his playmates were richer than he was.

"I knew at 15 pretty much what I wanted to do. I resolved that at 30 I would know more about poetry than any man living, that I would know what was accounted poetry everywhere, what part of poetry was inde-structible, what part could not be lost by translation and - scarcely less important what effects were obtainable in one language only and were utterly incapable of being

"In this search I learned more or less of nine foreign languages. I read Oriental stuff . . . I found every University regulation and every professor who tried to make me learn anything except this, or who both-ered me with 'requirements for degrees.'"

With a bachelor's degree from Hamilton

College in upstate New York in 1905 and a master's in 1906 from the University of Pennsylvania, Pound already knew the fate that awaited him:

Go little verse, Go forth and be damned Throughout your limited sphere
But prithee tell The bards in hell

Who live on nothing a year That a Master of Arts And a man of parts Is doing the same thing here.

HEN his first teaching post, as an instructor of Romance languages at Wabash College, ended in dismissal after a chorus girl was found asleep in his bed, Pound sailed in 1908 for Venice, "an excellent place to come to from Crawfordsville, Indiana." This stay lasted only a few his own expense, his first collection of poems, "A Lume Spento," and to develop a regard for the Venetian sun as a fixed point of return and repose in his life.

For a rookie American poet, however, the jousting ground was London and it was there that Pound appeared later that year. He sold his second book of poems, "Personae," the publisher Elkin Mathews, discoverer of W.B. Yeats, and went on to become the innovator to whom other innovators paid homage. He championed Frost as the bard for "serious people in America," prompted Yeats to change style in mid-career, was the translator T. S. Eliot called "the inventor of he also knew - from his parents' struggles to Chinese poetry for our time." Pound arranged publication of Eliot's "Prufrock" and edited a chaotic Eliot manuscript called "He Do the Police in Different Voices" into "The Waste Land."

From London (1908-21) and Paris (1921-24), and as "foreign correspondent" of the Chicago-based Poetry Magazine, Pound's influence extended to the spheres of music and fine arts. He had the compositions of Vivaldi in a Dresden library copied for himself, which is how they outlasted their destruction by Allied bombing. Pound sculpted and composed music, too. And crusaded for what he liked, writing books advocating the avant-garde music of George Antheil and the vorticist sculpture of Henri Gaudier-Brzeska. Gertrude Stein called him "a village explainer, excellent if you were a village, but you were not, not."

In Paris, Pound took boxing lessons from Hemingway and edited his first full volume of short stories. "In Our Time." He arranged publication of James Joyce's "Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man" as a serial in The Egoist, interested Harriet Weaver in becoming Joyce's benefactor, and even (with Yeats) applied successfully on Joyce's behalf, for a grant from the Royal Literary Fund.

But in London, another of Pound's "dis-coveries" had been Major C. H. Douglas and his Social Credit movement. Soon after the poet settled in Italy in the mid-1920s, false credit ("the beast with a hundred legs. USURA") became his root of all evil.

Pound's economics found fertile soil in Fascist Italy, where the "corporative state" and shortcut solutions of Benito Mussolini not only made trains run on time, but gave men more manhood, women more femininity, and many the illusion of renaissance, to all of which Pound was susceptible. He was broadcasting his economic theories from Rome as early as 1935. After the United States entered war, the broadcasts continued with distribes such as that of May 5, 1942:

"Europe callin' -- Pound speakin' . . The kike and the unmitigated evil that has been centered in London since the British government set on the Red Indians to murder the American frontier settlers, has herded the Slavs, the Mongols, the Tartar openly against Germany and Poland. And secretly against all that is decent in America, against the total American heritage. This is my war all right, I've been in it for twenty years my granddad was in it before me. "If the photographer cares about the peo-ple before the lens and is compassionate, much is given," Eve Arnold once wrote. "It is the photographer, not the camera, that is the instrument." She rather misses the days when photography was about people and not about photography.

People and the quotidian are her subjects and they have taken her from a wedding in the Hindu Kush to a bar in Cuba, from a harem in Abu Dhabi ("It's a boring life: They just sit around and grow fat and make bad jokes about their mutual husband.") to a Moscow divorce court; from photographing a monarch, Elizabeth II, to following a Holywood queen bee, Joan Crawford, through the fierce beauty regime that helped her cling to the top for three decades.

In 1960, she tripped over Richard Nixon's dog Checkers, mistaking the animal for a rug. She calls photojournalism a mixture of high adventure and low comedy. Philadelphia-born, a London resident for 23 years, she is equally at home in "a marvelous yurt in Mongolia and in her small flat in Mayfair.

"Figuratively. I've lived my life off the back of a camel, which is kind of fun," she says. "In the beginning when I would go off on a trip I would get on the plane covered in tears, hating to leave whatever security there was. Then, over the years, that became secu-

She is small, with precise movements and gray hair pulled back from a serenely observant face that she claims is unphotogenic. "She has elegance and dignity, an extraordinary vitality, endless curiosity." a journalist friend says. "She'll go anywhere, no matter how humiliating or vexing, if she thinks there's a picture to be taken. She's utterly without the snobbishness that afflicts a younger generation of photographers - they're like hemophiliacs, they go all limp." Her lack of pretension and her readiness for a good giggle, "which gives me the stom-ach to go to the next heavy course," come perhaps from having been a factory worker when she was very young and from coming to professional photography relatively late. Her first job was in a Hoboken photo finishing plant during World War II. It employed 1,500 people and by the end of the first year she was not ony managing the plant but had opened another one in Chicago. She quit work to take care of her baby son, who is now a doctor in England, and then was encouraged by her husband to join a photog-raphy class given at New York's New School by the great Russian-born art director of Harper's Bazaar, Alexei Brodovitch.

"Is most interesting documentary fashion," said Brodovitch. Do not do the other class assignments. Learn from doing." Her photography studies had lasted six weeks.

The respected English magazine Picture Post published the Harlem fashion show pictures. Mrs. Arnold is also a veteran of Life and Look, has worked for the color supplement of the Sunday Times of London since it began in the '60s and is a member of the Magnum agency. She has published four books of pictures with excellent and modest texts. She is doughty but has never succeeded in being tough.

"Many people think I should be," she says. "When I came back from South Africa, I thought I had a heart attack. I didn't. I was heartsick.

Later, her book, "The Unretouched Woman" (1976), was banned in South Africa because it included a view of Vanessa Redgrave's bare bottom, taken while she was etting into costume on a film set.

'That's not obscene," Eve Arnold says. "There is one picture in the book that is - a starving child in Zululand. That is obscene.

She tries not to judge but does not attempt to conceal what she feels. "It's not people I hate, it's the situation - poverty, disaster, children dying of starvation. If I hate it, I think I manage to say it. I was always interested in the basic thing, what makes people tick and what the facts are, although it's not always easy to say."

As a photojournalist, she relies in part on speed. "I think the difference between a fine photograph and an average one is being quick enough on the reflex to take advantage of the accident," she says. "And there are all

"The daily life of people is very hard to do," she says. "It's much more difficult than the set-up kind of photograph, which has a lot going for it because you light it and tart it up and add to it and show what you think was there. The other thing is to try to figure out what people were really like, and that is

Her China pictures traveled through the United States for three years and the curator of the exhibition said of the pictures, "What is left after the factual material, is in the realm of art."

Although flattered, Eve Arnold cannot resist adding, "I don't look at it that way, it's not important whether photography is an art or not. What is important is if it shows people something they wouldn't have seen if they hadn't seen the photograph."

So as to have as easy a rapport as possible with her subjects, she uses neither lights nor fancy lenses nor an assistant. She got a splendidly unctuous picture of the Reverend Jerry Falwell for her last book, "In America." by replying when he told her to set up ber lights where she pleased, "Reverend Falwell, I use no additional light. I use God's light." Laughing, she says, "I was shocked at myself, I didn't say it deliberately, I promise you. He was instantly my slave."

"In America" (1983), an all-color attempt to re-view her native land after so many years abroad, was her hardest book. "And " could speak the language, that's the worst of it," she says. In 36 states, over two years, she photographed and interviewed Navahos, Hasidic Jews, construction workers, lady mud wrestlers, socialites, a group of male homosexual nuns called The Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence, Laotian immigrants, Clansmen, cattle breeders, drug addicts, Shakers, Buddhists, Sulis and a man outside the White House holding a sign, "Hypocrisy Stinks." A lot of the time she was very

Five years earlier, Eve Arnold published a book of black and white pictures of the 1950s called "Flashback! The 50's." The pictures are perfect period pieces and are also premonitory in their hints of today's mindless violence and plastic tattiness. "The sailor reading a newspaper," a critic says of one picture, "his wife in that bouffant skirt and the children looking like cutouts - it's all like a new form of cornflake." The 1980s are there in embryo.

Today, few Americans talk about life or living. Eve Arnold wrote in her text. "They talked about 'lifestyle,' seeming to suggest infinite choice, as though the blue-collar worker on minimum hourly wage that I was talking to in New Mexico, or the miner in Virginia had deliberately chosen his way of life or arranged his own circumstances."

"In America" is more static than Eve Arnold's other books because much of it shows lifestyles being consciously pursued rather than life being lived. There is little of the subject she does so well: people simply enjoying each other, like the reunited Cuban family on the Gulf of Mexico in 1954,

"I can only follow my mind's illogic," Eve Arnold says, "which throws up moods felt, images experienced and — I hope — a sense of the time's true atmosphere."

Shards From the Musical Digs

by Donal Henahan

EW YORK — Archaeologists do not need to unearth complete cities or nations to know what a lost culture was all about. Sometimes talented diggers can see a universe, so to speak, in a grain of sand, Looking at a few ards, bones and fragmented tools, they extrapolate and reconstruct with great freedom, their creative imaginations probably fired by the scarcity of hard evidence. Too much tangible data, in fact, might only stifle the creative urge to build whole civilizations out of hints and hypotheses.
With that in mind, I offer some miscellaneous shards, bits of information drawn from a musical culture that may not be lost yet but certainly seems in danger of being butied at times. Perhaps the following news items are pieces of some great truth not readily discernible, only waiting to be fitted into the big puzzle.

A physician in Boston, for instance, has proposed that Van Gogh's prolific output of paintings as well as his aggressiveness and other strange habits resulted from a disturbance of the brain. That in itself is hardly news. Undisturbed people do not usually cut off their own ears, for one thing. In the past, doctors have speculated that Van Gogh's problem was schizophrenia, digitalis poisoning or terminal color blindness.

However, Dr. Shahram Khoshbin of Harvard Medical School contends that the painter suffered from personality disorder as a result of (I hope I have this right) temporal lobe epilepsy. The ailment apparently triggered something known in psychiatric circles as hypographia, which is defined as a tendency to produce voluminous and compulsive writing, music composition and paint-ing. So said the article in my favorite supermarket tabloid. I am inclined to go along with Khoshbin on Van Gogh because he obviously has given the question a lot of thought. His theory does raise larger problems, however. It seems logical to assume that hypographia was rampant among composers in centuries past but has been all but conquered recently, like polio and smallpox. Bach, Telemann, Mozart, Donizetti, Beethoven and Schubert suffered from the condition dreadfully, judging from their staggering outputs. Verdi and Wagner came down with a touch of it, too. But sometime around the turn of the century temporal lobes throughout Western culture healed mysteriously and musical production began to fall off precipitously. Except for a stray Shostakovich or two, composers no longer felt driven to turn out piles of manu-scripts. The former plague of masterpleces abated. Today it is the rare composer who is afflicted. Where a Rossini or a Donizetti might feel the need to fling off an opera a month to appeare andience hunger, their modern counterparts are in no such grip. Good health is now endemic in the musical

If sanity may have come thus to musical composition, it sometimes still can be found raging in the opera. The director Andrei Serban, for instance, recently announced that in his new production of "Norma" for the New York City Opera he would allow the work to end the way the composer and librettist wanted it to, with the tenor Pollione joining his priestess wife Norma on the pyre. He had previously directed a version in Wales that replaced Pollione on the pyre with Norma's confidente, Adalgisa, a femi-nist twist nowhere to be found in Bellim's score. In the present operatic climate, Serban's decision in favor of the composer's version, taken after much soul-searching. struck an interviewer as startling enough to be worth reporting in detail.

PERA, however, is still the best place to look for mad scenes. From the Salzburg Festival comes a report of a "Macbeth" rehearsal in which the director came to blows with the festival's secretarygeneral, Otto Sertl. Piero Faggioni, infuriated by Sertl's request that the density of dryice fog be lessened in one scene to benefit the singers, slapped the official twice in the face. A contributing factor in the dispute, which apparently had been simmering for days, was the official's refusal to approve Faggioni's plan to use topless witches in the Verdi opera, I admit I am not sure about the larger meaning, if any, of this incident, but it may be a straw in the wind. Opposition to directorial egotism and excess could be growing, even among impresarios.

The academic avant-garde, ever faithful to its stock of revolutionary old ideas, also continues on its mad, mad, grant-gathering way. A press release from the music department of the University of California at San Diego reports that four composers, three Americans and one Japanese, will collaborate on a new piece with the support of the National Endowment for the Arts. The composers — John Cage, Toru Takemitsu, Ed-win Harkins and Philip Larson — will ex-change ideas via mail and telephone during the next few months. "Thereupon they will hold a one-week conference to finalize the piece before its premiere in San Diego next spring." Such joint ventures are hardly new Beethoven and 50 others wrote variations on a Diabelli waltz, for instance — but groupthink by telephone adds a wrinkle. What will technology do for us next?

The press release, I believe, is one of the unappreciated art forms of our time, often ng to a kind of visionary Dada. I study this form of literature as closely and with as much amazement as any Greek ever read entrails. If you knew nothing else about American musical culture in the last decades of the 20th century, a release from the Cleveland Opera about a Luciano Pavarotti recital earlier this season might be enlightening enough. The Ohio program, which followed Pavarotti's circuslike appearances at Madison Square Garden, was held in the Richfield Coliseum, which seats 16,000. Besides installing a special sound system for the occasion, the Cleveland impresarios took further mercy on Pavarotti's long-distance admirers: "One pair of complimentary opera asses will be given to every couple in order to further enhance their enjoyment of this spectacular event." That is music by hearsay, and possibly the only music of the future.

What other cultural insights has the mail brought recently? Well, a notice that a new rock 'n' roll magazine will not be offered on newsstands but is to be sold exclusively at McDonald's restaurants. (How neat: Rock music as fast food.) Also, an announcement by a New York choral group of a forthcoming performance of "Giuseppe Verdi's emotionally charged 'Messadi Requiem,'" evidently a version of the "Manzoni Requiem." As I say, I am not able to stand back far enough from these cultural fragments to discern what they may mean. Perhaps nothing at all, perhaps everything. If any historical society or archaeological archive wants to preserve these data, I will be glad to contribute my research free -contingent, of course, on a favorable ruling by the Internal Reve-

Following Literary Footprints Through the Streets of Bath

by Benedict Nightingale

ATH, England — You can hardly walk a yard in Bath without duplicating the footsteps of some literary ghost. Start at the stately Royal Crescent, continue through the Circus and south to Queen Square, then cut east to the High Street: you are tracing the precise route that Charles Dickens's Sam Weller took to the greengrocer's shop in whose upper rooms he found a party of carousing footmen and watched the host dance the "frog hornpipe" on a table

Or go north from the Pump Room across Cheap Street to Milsom Street: with you is Jane Austen's coquettish Isabella Thorpe, followed by two mildly lustful young men, whose notice she "was so far from seeking to attract that she looked back at them only

Press on higher and higher, to Lansdown Crescent, then up Sion Hill. That's where Austen herself went one fine day with a Mrs. Chamberlayne, who walked so fast that "I could with difficulty keep pace with her, yet would not flinch for the world." That's the way William Beckford, author of the Gothic novei "Vathek, an Arabian Tale," would regularly ride on his gray Arab, accompa-nied by four grooms, six dogs and a mishapen dwarf named Perro.

Addison, Pope, Smollett, Farmy Burney, Goldsmith, Sheridan — but the list of writers who knew Bath well is longer than that, and the site's literary associations are about as old as they could be. The city is, after all, supposed to have been founded by the greatgrandson of Virgil's Aeneas, the father of Shakespeare's King Lear, Prince Bladud, as he was called contracted leprosy, was expelled from the British court, and became a swineherd. Unluckily, he passed the disease on to his pigs and, fearful of his master's anger, drove the infected animals over the River Avon into a swampy valley. There they wallowed, as did he when he followed them into the mud. He had discovered the hot and healing springs of Bath, with all the predicterected a fine spa on the site of his cure, ascended the throne, and eventually handed over his kingdom to a son silly enough to want to divide it among his daughters, there-by giving us Shakespeare's greatest tragedy.

If you stand in the Pump Room and look through the window at the steaming King's Bath, you can see a 17th-century plaque confidently placing Bladud's discovery in 863 B.C. More orthodox historians would say the city dates from the time of the Romans, who established a settlement called Aquae Sulis and constructed an elaborate system of baths around a temple to Minerva. the remains of which have been thoroughly excavated and are well worth visiting.

In the Middle Ages the city was prosperous again, a well-known wool-marketing center peopled by such assertive citizens as Chancer's Wife of Bath, who surpassed 'them of Ypres and of Gaunt" at clothmaking and cheerfully boasted of the five husbands ("Welcome to the sixth when that ever he shall") she'd already buried.

It was Charles II's stay in 1663 that made Bath à fashionable soa. Samuel Penys visited there live years later, paced "the many good streets" and went to the 16th-century Abbey Church, where "a vain pragmatical fellow preached a ridiculous affected sermon, that made me angry." He returned for evening service the same day, only to find the same man in the pulpit: "I slept." Nor does he seem to have been much mollified by the architectural excellences that have particularly impressed later visitors, such as the graceful fan-vaulting above the choir or the great west facade, with its angels clambering to and from heaven.

The Royal Crescent in Bath.

his life being terrified by the facade: "No ancient iconoclast or modern Calvinist could have looked on the outside of the Church with more horror than the image of Jacob's Ladder present to my infant eye."

The baths themselves, though, were the main destinations of both diarist and novelist-to-be. The child Scott spent much time immersed, but without the least benefit to the lameness that always afflicted him. Pepys went to be "parboiled" for two hours, then "carried away wrapped in a sheet, and in a chair home." In his account of the experience, he also questioned whether it was "clean to get so many bodies together in the same water," a doubt often echoed later. Tobias Smollett, a doctor as well as a novelist, published a pamphlet attacking the promiscuous bathing of "diseased persons of all ages, sexes and conditions," and in his "Expedition of Humphrey Clinker" left a memorable picture of ladies in brown jackets submerged to their necks and looking "so flushed and so frightful that I always turn my eyes the other way."

ATHING is prohibited now, thanks to the discovery of an amoeba at the hot spring's surface. The intrepid visitor, in search of a dip or a nostalgic aquatic jostle, will have to wait until the opening of new, uncontaminated pools, expected in 1987. But already he can safely drink the water they'll contain and decide whether he agrees with Sam Weller, who thought it tasted "particklery unpleasant," with "a wery strong flavor o' warm flatirons." Indeed, he can walk around the Pump Room with his glass and imagine the many who came to imbibe, gossip, talk scandal and make trysts both before and after its rebuilding in the

The Corinthian columns mentioned in Dickens's "Pickwick Papers" are still there, and the music gallery, and even the great Tompion clock near which the Dowager Lady Snuphanuph, Lord Mutanhed and other Bath notables grandly perambulated. In Jane Austen's "Northanger Abbey" Mrs. Thorpe sat beneath the same clock for 10 minutes before realizing that the lady beside her was Mrs. Allen: "Their joy on this meeting was very great, as well it might, since they had been contented to know other for the last 15 years."

That was in 1797 or thereabouts, by which streets may not always be at the mutual

Sir Walter Scott, who spent a year in a time Bath was the handsome place that, house nearby when he was 5, remembered all subtract the odd 19th-century mutilation subtract the odd 19th-century mutilation and 20th-century excrescence, we know to-day. Pepys may have liked the old city, but his fellow diarist John Evelyn probably spoke for more when he called its streets narrow, uneven and unpleasant." Increas ingly, it seemed inadequate for what it had increasingly become, the summer retreat of fashionable Londoners who, as Oliver Goldsmith explained, "wanted some place where they might have each others' company, and win each others' money, as they had done during the winter in town."

> HANGE was clearly needed, and change was provided by three of the > 18th century's more remarkable men. One was Bean Nash, the city's Master of Ceremonies, arbiter of elegance and uncrowned king: He made Bath a safe haven for the genteel and the chic. Another was Ralph Allen, who provided it with its distinctive pale limestone from his quarries nearby. The third was John Wood, the city's chief architect and master builder and father of its next great architect, John Wood the High to the south of the town, and still worth a visit, is the magnificent Palladian mansion Wood the elder built for Allen, Prior Park. Alexander Pope planned the last book of his great "Dunciad" in its library. Indeed he often stayed with Allen, the reconstruction of Bath gradually reconciling him to a city that earlier had reminded him of "rocks and dirt, brimstones and fogs." Sam-uel Richardson came, and so did Henry Fielding, who briefly lived nearby, in a plain gray house that you still pass if you extend your walk to Prior Park to go past Widcombe Church. In there he wrote part of "Tom Jones," immortalizing Allen himself as the munificent Squire Allworthy.

Meanwhile, the Palladian mecca that was

Bath itself began to spread in the valley below, from there up the steep meadows to the north of the old city, then to both east and west. Not everyone was delighted with the work of Wood and his successors. "Like the wreck of streets and squares disjointed by an earthquake," lamented Matthew Bramble in "Humphrey Clinker."

Certainly, one of the city's charms is its blend of the formal and the unpredictable. the symmetrical and the rambling. The buildings are often superb in themselves, with their poised pediments and balanced pilasters, their perfectly placed windows and doors - and, of course, their mellow color. How best to explore Bath's literary past? Well, there are writers whose trail, if you follow it, will take you all over town. Sheridan, for instance. Start at North Parade Rridge, look down onto the west bank of the Avon, and there's a tiny, unprepossessing stone alcove. That's Sheridan's Grotto, a hiding-place for lovers and a post-box for billets-doux, perhaps including those of the dramatist-to-be. Walk slowly back into the city center, and reminders of his great "Rivels" angles a master planner might wish, but the vals" are everywhere. North Parade and its parallel terrace, South Parade, are where Jack Absolute and Sir Lucius O'Trigger plot-ted their next moves in the game of love. The stark Masonic hall in Old Orchard Street was once Bath's famous Theatre Royal, the place where the play itself triumphed after Press farther west, to the theater that replaced it in 1804, and you're in what used to be King's Mead Fields, where Sir Anthony Absolute stopped a duel between his son Jack and O'Trigger, and Mrs. Malaprop per-petrated the last of many malapropisms ("thou barbarous Vandyke"), and all the expected romantic resolutions were reached. But let's not forget Sheridan's own romantic resolution, because its fame apread far beyond the Bath of the early 1770s. The beautiful Elizabeth Linley was first affi-anced by her greedy father to an elderly landowner, then harassed by a married rone with "secret and objectionable attentions, followed by disgraceful proposals." She needed rescue, and got it from Sheridan. From his bouse at 7 Terrace Walk (now, anticlimactically, a sports shop) he sent a sedan chair to fetch her clandestinely from her family home at 11 Royal Crescent, and with a chaperon they cloped to France, where they were secretly married.

The matter didn't end there. Sheridan was seriously wounded in the second of two duels with the resentful roue, on Kingsdown Hill. just out of Bath. But he survived to write, not only "The Rivals," but the "Pump Room Sketch" that eventually evolved into "The School for Scandal."

The Jane Austen trail is more daunting still. She moved reluctantly to Bath in 1801, actually fainting dead away when her father told her it was more than just another short family visit. She left in 1806 without either personal regrets or cause for professional satisfaction, since the manuscript of "North-anger Abbey" was simply gathering dust in the office of the local publisher who had bought if for £10; but there's hardly a street, square or crescent that she and her characters have not made permanently their own.

Seek out No. 13 in Wood the elder's magnificent Queen Square, Make your way to No. I Paragon, nowadays a dowdy place, part of it a shop selling ex-military clothing. That's where the family was visited by a Mr. Mailland, at whom "I am prevented from setting my cap by his having a wife and ten children." But the Austens finally settled farther from the city center. Cross the Avon by Robert Adam's Pulseney Bridge, the only one in Britain lined entirely by shops. Contime through octagonal Laura Place, where Lady Dalrymple lived in "Persuasion," and past the long grand terraces of Pulteney Street, where Catherine Morland lodged in Northanger Abbey."

At the end, opposite the park in which Jane herself saw lireworks that were "really beautiful and surpassing my expectations, is 4 Sydney Place, where she spent several years: a demure, unpretentious house, re-markable only for the jumble of tiny holes in the stones around the door, like an arch of Gruvère cheese.

But it's a better use of time to combine Jane Austen's trail with the pursuit of other literary memories. Start, perhaps, at Milsom Street, still the magnet for browsers it was in her day, though the print shop into which Anne Elliot saw Admiral Croft staring in "Persuasion" is probably now Culpeper the Herbalists, or Jolly's Department Store, or (disconcertingly). Sweeney Todd's Eating House. A surprising-ly romantic street, this. Here ledged Henry Timey Catherine Morland's beloved Here Anne Eliot herself first caught a glimpse of Captain Wentworth, whom she had unwisely rejected years before, and "for a few minutes saw nothing before her, it was all confusion." And near here, in Union Street, she and he were reconciled, and strolled up to Milsom Street "seeing neither sauntering politicians, bustling housekeepers, flirting Turn left to Gay Street, where Jane Ausrather longer, where Smollett wrote "Hant-phrey Clinker" and Dr. Johnson's admed Mrs. Thrale came permanently to live after the second marriage that so upset him.

Smollett's Matthew Bramble (that change complainer) thought the street difficult, steep, slippery, extremely dangerous," and even derided the famous Circus that stands to its north. It was, he said, "a pretty banble, constructed for show, like Vespasian's am-phitheater turned outside in." Also, it badly. needed a colomiade, because in rainy weather the waiting sedan chairs became "so many. boxes of wet leather, for the benefit of the gouty and theumatic." But contemporary visitors are likely to be less critical of its fiery. of columns, Corinthian and Ionic and Daric, its chiseled friezes, and the great stone acons weirdly perched on top of its graceful. arcs. Moreover, it is only a short walk to the majestic curve of the Royal Crescent, surely the most impressive sight in all Bath.

PRESS north, braving a slope that, Dickens himself thought resembled "the perpendicular street a man sees in a dream, which he cannot get up for the life of him," and there's more Dickens to discover. In a simple but elegant yellow-gray house, 35 St. James's Square, lived the poet-Walter Savage Landor, said to be the proto-type of the ebullient Boythorn in "Bleak House." Longfellow was there once, and Dickens was a regular visitor: According to his biographers, that's where he heard the story that inspired the character of Little

By that time Bath had indeed become a quiet and sedate city, a natural resting place. for the invalid, the aged and the dead. If you want to be reminded of merrier times, you should turn around and go southeast to the pleasant other building that could once. present Assembly Rooms are neither the only ones - there were others, now no more. than a plaque on the sidewalk, near the, Abbey — nor precisely the same ones that. Sheridan, Goldsmith and Jane Austen knew. Mostly, they're a lovingly exact replica of those damaged by the Luftwaffe in 1942.

Actually, some thought Bath was in de-cline by the time those New Assembly Rooms opened, in 1771. The raffish aristocrats who had come to gamble and whore away their fortunes, provoking John Wesley to dub the city "Satan's headquarters," were less and less to be seen, the rising middle: class more and more.

Yet the writers did not stay away. Shelley and Wordsworth came like Crabbe and Sterne before them. William Beckford came.: to rechristen his house in Lansdown Crescent "Baghdad," to scandalize the neighbors with the exotic rites supposedly occurring inside, then to build a faintly Moorish (and still visitable) tower on the hill behind. Swinburne came to celebrate Bath as England's Florence, "the lovely city whose grace no grief deflowers"; Hardy to look down on its "dim concave, towers and spires" from Beechen Cliff to the south, and Kipling to compose the unsoliticed tribute to Aquae Solis he put into the mouth of a centurion in "Puck of Pook's Hill" "Everyone goes there—the best baths in Britain, as good as Rome" Edith Sitwell came to write a 280page book about the place that doesn't even get as far as Jane Austen. But then, there's hardly another city in Britain with so much : literary history embedded in its walls.

ATT NOT WELL !!

THE Air France Concorde took off from Paris-Charles de Gaulle on schedule at 11 A.M. for New York. An hour and 20 minutes later, the 68 passengers were halfway through their gourmet hunch when the captain announced with ineffable Gallic regret, that they had jost a hydranlic system and were returning to Paris to change aircraft.

There was remarkably little wailing and gnashing of teeth among folk who had paid around $1,600 for the one-way trip (they were reimbursed the 17 percent fare difference from ordinary firetoless). Marke year ence from ordinary first-class). Maybe you become more philosophical when you've arrived (metaphorically speaking), a screnity no doubt potentiated by the liberal libations of Dom Ruinart Blanc de Blanc 1978.

At 3:35 P.M. they were on their way again and after a flight of just three hours 29 minutes landed at JFK at 1:04 P.M. local time. Four hours late to be sure, but only a few minutes later than the 747 that had left Paris at 10:30 that morning.

To be fair, this was not a typical day for Concorde (although it does illustrate the prowess of this extraordinary aircraft). According to Air France, nearly 90 percent of Concorde flights arrive within 15 minutes of schedule. This is due in part to having a spare Concorde — out of the fleet of four — always standing by at both Paris and New York and that its scheduled arrival time in New York (8:45 A.M.) and its departure time for Paris (1 P.M.) allow it to escape the major congestion at JFK. At twice the speed of sound and a cruising altitude of 10 miles (nearly twice that of a 747) the slender, 100and turbulence. seat craft is virtually unaffected by winds

All this adds up to a unique travel caper-ence for which a steadily growing number of people are prepared to pay. Air France has seen its load factor increase from around 51 percent in 1982 to nearly 62 percent for the first six months of this year. And British Airways (the only other carrier with the Concorde) has had a similar experience.

Next January, both airlines celebrate the 1.77. 22.1 10th anniversary of commercial supersonic travel with Concorde making a surprisingly healthy contribution to income. In 1984, Air France reported an "operating profit" of 63.4 million frances on sales of 592 million. and British Airways £11 million on sales of £95 million. (This does not include the cost of development nor depreciation on the sevor development not deposition of the planes each acquired by two airlines, this en planes each acquired by two airlines, this being absorbed by the French and British governments.) This is a dramatic improvement on four or five years ago when it might have made commercial sense to ground the Concorde fleet.

> The reasons for this almost magical turnaround are that Concorde, as an inveterate gas-guzzler, has benefited more from lower oil prices than subsonic aircraft; the strength of the dollar has brought more revenue relative to costs; the elimination of unprofitable routes (British Airways axed Bahrain and Singapore: Air France dropped Mexico, Caracas; Rio and Washington; and the astronishing growth of the charter market.

> British Airways will operate at least 200 Concorde charters this year, day trips to Reykjavik (for a Viking feast), Bordeaux (for wine tasting and a lunch in Saint-Emilion), Bermuda (for eight hours on the beach), Cairo (to see the pyramids), and incentive tours for prized employees or customers and promotions for new products. Package tiems with the Venice-Simplon-Orient-Express and the OE2 are also big business:

> Air France does an average of one charter a week. A recent example was a trip from Atlantic City to Nice with a planeload of gamblers to sample the tables at Monte Carlo. Another was a group of astronomy buffs Crackerbarrel nonsense, but the U. S. authorities called it treason — and Pound was indicted in 1943. For once in American history, a poet was held accountable for his words. To date, however, the last word is Pound's (in Canto LXXIV), "that free speech without free radio speech is as zero."

In the spring of 1945, two Italian partisans knocked on Pound's door with rifle butts and led him into American custody. Handcuffed to a black accused of rape and mur-him in a floodlit outdoor cage for three weeks. The excuse for this was that Fascists might try to rescue Pound, then approaching his 60th birthday. But there, in his cage, he

Under white clouds, cielo di Pisa out of all this beauty something must come

Just as Cervantes and Bunyan may have found their greatness in prison cells, Pound reaffirmed his in the cage near Pisa. The fruit of Pound's ordeal, "The Pisan Cantos," was published while he was in Washington's St.

Elizabeth Hospital for the Criminally Insane

as mentally unfit to stand trial for treason.

After "The Pisan Cantos" were awarded

America's most prestigious honor, the Bollingen-Library of Congress Award, for "the highest achievement of American poetry" in 1948, Pound lingered, but seldom languished, in his Washington bedlam for an-

who were able to track the eclipse of the sun for two hours with Concorde (it actually has to slow down to Mach 1.3). The cost of chartering Concorde varies from $40,000 for a joy-ride across Europe to $250,000 and up for a trans-Atlantic flight. Concorde, which had been written off as a magnificent failure, has never had it so good.

Therein is the problem, and the irony, for Concorde is a finite resource. The production line was closed down after 16 aircraft (two are currently with the manufacturers) and three prototypes had been built. By all accounts, the plane is aging gracefully and should last for at least another 20 years, but spare parts will become more costly once the present airframes have been cannibalized. British Airways has recently taken its seventh and last Concorde out of mothballs; Air France is refurbishing its fifth.

But what counts most is getting there. And this is down to schedules as much as speed. BA, which operates two round-trip Concorde flights a day between London and New York (plus a thrice-weekly service from London to Washington and on to Miami) gives you the choice of a 10:30 A.M. departure from London, which gets you to New York at 9:20 A.M. in time for a day's work, or a 7 P.M. departure, which arrives at 5:50 P.M. in time for dinner. Flying east (the worst for jet lag), you can avoid the agony of a sleepless night in the sky by catching either the 9:30 A.M. or the 1:45 P.M. departures which get in to London at 6:10 P.M. and 10:25 P.M. respectively. Air France has one round trip a day from Paris, which arrives in New York at 8:45 P.M. The return flight leaves at 1 P.M., arriving in Paris at 10:45 P.M. You can have breakfast in Paris, a three-hour meeting in Manhattan, and be home the same night. And you can be in your office the next morning fit and rested.

The value of Concorde depends on how much you value your time. For example, a round-trip Paris-New York by Concorde costs around $3,300 compared with $1,500 business class. The time saving on a round-trip is approximately 7 hours 30 minutes, which works out at a measly $240 an hour. Surely our time is worth as much as that It's hardly surprising that many Concorde passengers are people who either sell their own time directly, like psychiatrists and Wall Street lawyers, or owner-presidents of medium-size companies who have little corporate backup. Says Jean-Claude Martin, inspector-general of Air France: "It's not so much the jet set, they prefer the caviar of first class, nor the president of Chase Manhattan; they've already sent over their vice presidents, they have more time. It's people who run smaller companies of up to 2,000 employees who have no one else to send.

Two-thirds of Concorde passengers have flown Concorde before and, according to er in the United States, 10 percent are regulars who travel at least twice a month. This explains why there is a distinct clublike ambience aboard. Everybody seems to know everyone else and the cabin crew know many passengers by name. It's like being in a corporate jet or a commuter aircraft. It's definitely the way to fly. If you can afford it.

If you have to fly subsonic, shop around for the deepest discount ticket you can get. You'll get there just as quickly as everyone else, and you can make seven trips for the price of one on the Concorde.

Upon his discharge in 1958, he was given into custody of his wife, Dorothy Shake-spear, and returned to Italy, where she resided (She died in 1973; their son, Omar Shake-

ed. (She died in 1973; their son, Omar Shake-spear Pound, was born 1926 in Paris.) But Pound spent his later years living in Venice with the American violinist Olga Rudge (mother of his illegitimate daughter, now Princess Mary de Rachewiltz, born 1925 in Italy) Ha completed and political his "Com-

Italy). He completed and polished his "Cantos" — 120 in all (Pisa's were numbers 74-84), modeled after Dante and comprising Pound's own history of the world. After his health began to deteriorate in 1959, however,

Pound wrote relatively little and spoke mostly in monosyllables when he spoke at all.

Today, more than a decade after his death, only his antics are arguable. In the last year, as his centenary neared, he has been honored with congresses in Venice, Milan and Zurich; Cambridge, England, and Orono,

Maine, as well as concerts in Rome and Manie, as well as concerts in Robie and Naples. At 90, Olga Rudge still tends the narrow three-room triplex house in Venice where she and Pound spent his declining years. Obsessed with expunging his anti-

Semitic notoriety, she is documenting Pound's dossier with testimony from some of his best friends who are Jewish. On or about Pound's 100th birthday, she hopes to hold a simple observance at the Cini Poun-dation nearby, where Gaudier-Brzeska's famous bust of the poet rests on its base by Isamu Noguchi. If all goes well, a priest, a minister, and a rabbi will officiate.

Bouzigues and Its Mussels

OUZIGUES, France — This is the kind of place that could be called a brand-name town, as in Camembert or Cognac; places with gastronomic reputations that surpass their touristic worth.

Bouzigues - as in moules de Bouzigues might well bill itself as the mussel capital of France. This Languedoc village at the northern tip of the Bassin de Than, cultivates onethird of France's mussel crop, a crop that totals more than 80,000 tons each year.

In contrast to the nearby Mediterranean port of Sete, with its overcrowded streets, bleak quayside restaurants, and oil refineries, Bouzigues — population 904 — is calm, clean and beautiful. A romantic, moody sort of beautiful, with a gray-blue saltwater lagoon that fades gently into the sandy blue haze of the sky and vineyards that crowd right up to the water's edge. Like a stark, exotic Japanese painting that says it all in a few strokes, Bouzigues says it all with a few sticks sprouting from the water.

As you drive along N113 just east of town, row after orderly row of stilt-like frames jut out from the water. If you did not know they were raising mussels and oysters out there, you would be confused, for the brownishgray frames resemble strange, stationary rafis. They appear at once inaccessible and

But it is from these frames, clinging to hundreds of nets and sticks attached to cords hanging down into the shallow lagoon, that France's biggest, darkest fleshiest mussels are brought to maturity.

Unlike the smaller Atlantic coast moules

de bouchos, which grow clinging to fat oak poles driven into the sediment of shallow coastal beds. Bouzigues mussels grow in sus-

Hanging on tight with the bundle of tough, hairlike fibers we call the beard, the mussel grows clinging to wooden sticks or metal rods dangling into the water. Some mussels also grow encased in nets several meters long, nets that expand, month after month, as the blue-bearded bivalves grow, producing bright orange, succulent meat en-cased in violet-tinged, blackish shells.

As mussels hang in suspension, they profit from the lagoon's slow-moving current, en-hanced by the wind, assuring a steady supply of food in the form of plankton. As they capture their food, they filter water at a rapid pace, some mussels filtering at the rate of 15 gallons a day. Every few months, the nets and poles are thinned, and the growing mussels are put back into the water.

They grow slowly, very slowly. By the time the mussel is ready for the table, it's about to celebrate its first birthday.

HERE is no better place to consume the mussels of Bouzigues than on the spot, and the prettiest spot in town is La Côte Bleue, a modest modern motel and restaurant with a marvelous terrace overlooking the glistening mussel and oyster

This is a lovely restaurant for family dining. As you enter, you can watch workers shucking platters of shellfish in a little glass-enclosed room, while smiling waiters are carrying platters onto the shaded veranda. It is a big place, but not impersonal; service is warm, efficient and friendly, even if you have to wait an hour for a table on a warm and sunny Sunday.

On summer afternoons the terrace and indoor dining room fill up with French families sharing the fresh and generous plateau de fruits de mer (here they call it the super corbeille), downing glasses of the local Listel eris de eris, a pale and delicious rosè that comes from grapes grown on the nearby sand dunes of the Golfe du Lion. Its lightness and low alcohol content (about 10 percent) make it perfect for summer sipping.

La Côte Bleue's shellfish platter is one of the freshest I've ever tasted, including the rare local huttres plates of Bouzigues (iodinerich and delicious), tiny clams, sweet crab, meaty langoustines, chewy bulots and buccins, and of course, the local mussels. Because Bouzigues mussels are meatier and larger, they're the preferred mussel for eating raw on the half-shell. Even those who aren't fans of raw mussels (I wasn't, until I tasted them here) should try them.

The plateau also includes the unusual vio-let, a shellfish a Frenchman once described to me as a soft-shelled oyster. It's not the prettiest thing you ever saw, resembling an old potato from a corner of the cupboard. Its taste, as well, is unusual, rather iodine-strong with a soft texture not unlike that of an oyster. The French also call them figue de mer - sea fig.

The local mussel is also available in a wonderful stuffed version: The raw mussels are opened by hand, filled with a fine-flavored sausage meat, tied shut with a string, then quickly sautéed in oil. They are cooked again, in tomato sauce, opened and served over a platter of white rice.

If you hit a lucky day, La Côte Bleue might also be serving cigales de mer, tiny "sea crickets," lovely-looking creatures with mottled black-on-red shells. In form and flavor, they resemble crayfish, but meatier and more tender. Served much like langoustines, they are best split in two and grilled. Another worthwile offering is chef Olivier Lombard's rillettes de Thau, a compact, fullflavored fish terrine that combines rouget, rascasse, smoked salmon and herbs, served with toast and a dash of lemon.

Before or after lunch, visitors may want to take in the little Musée de la Conchyliculture, where you can learn a bit about raising fish and shellfish, and watch a fascinating video (in French), including interviews with local fishermen. Also, up and down the coastline along this scenic portion of N113, there are roadside oyster and mussel stands and a pleasant beach in the lively nearby town of Mèze.

La Côte Bleue, 34140 Bouzigues (15 kilometers northwest of Sète), tel: (67) 78,30.87. Closed Sunday evening and Monday from July I to Sept. I, and Tuesday evening and Wednesday from Sept. I to July I. Closed February and the third week of October. No credit cards. A la carte, about 200 francs a person, including wine and service.

The Restoration of the Grand Véfour

by Susan Heller Anderson

ARIS — Like an heirloom jewel in an ever-changing setting, the 18th-century Palais Royal glows softly in the heart of Paris. Stepping through its arches is a leap into another time.

Two monuments anchor the Palais Royal: on one corner, the Comedie Française, the national repository of the French theater. On the other, the Grand Véfour, a monument of French gastronomy.

The restaurant reached its pinnacle shortly after World War II when it was taken over by Raymond Oliver, who did much in France to popularize French cooking on television. It began to wane about seven years ago, and in 1983 the restaurant, which for 30 years had held three stars in the Michelin Guide, lost one due to Oliver's increasing absence because of failing health.

Now, like generations of chanteuses and danseuses, the Grand Vélour is making a comeback. Complete with face-lift and new repertoire, it reopened last fall under new ownership. (Now closed for the summer vacation, it opens its doors again on Monday.)

Its new owner, the Taitt uger family of Champagne fame, has spent six million francs (about $700,000 at current rates) to restore the decor to former glory, which is pretty glorious. Its two dining rooms are covered, ceilings included, with elaborate paintings on silk depicting the harvest, the hunt and other food themes. With carved paneling, elaborate gilding, mirrors, chandeliers, red velvet and lace curtains, the setting strikes one as delicious, refined excess. The restoration, painstakingly done by 45 workers under the eye of an architect from the Department of Historical Monuments, removed decades of smoke and grease. Windows were made bomb resistant (the restaurant was damaged and several diners injured in a bombing in December 1983). Everything was scrubbed in the first cleaning since 1940. As a classified historical monument, not an inch of its interior can be changed.

The painted-silk decor, a transition be-tween the styles of Louis XVI and the Directoire, perplexes historians, who do not know who did it. It was not installed until the restaurant, which began as the Café de Char-tres in about 1782 (or possibly 20 years earlier), was several decades old. The restaurant got its present name in 1814 from Jean Véfour, an owner and former chef to a member of the royal family. As restaurants go, there is nothing quite like the Grand Véfour for sheer glamour. In the 1985 Ganlt-Millau Guide, it gets no rating because of the new chef, but nearly half a page is devoted to it. "Very rapidly, the Parisian public has found the way once more to this inspired place," the editors say.

"More and more, we are getting a younger clientele," said Yvon Courault, the manager. "People who had left are now coming back, with businessmen and habitues at lunch." At lunch, the smaller room is pretty; in the evening, the larger room more glamorous.

But the Taittingers want to charm palates as well as eyes. "The grand design is to regain the third star," said Thierry Taittinger, the family's spokesman. Normally, when a restaurant changes hands, at least one star in the Michelin Guide is withdrawn. But Le

Grand Véfour stayed at two.

The menu, which changes four times a year, has such delectable items as consommé with tiny ravioli stuffed with chicken, fillet of sea bass green with herbs and small artichokes, filet of lamb wrapped in a spinach leaf and a paper-thin crisp of pastry and, in nomage to Oliver, oeufs au plat Louis Oliver, his creation of fried eggs with foie gras. The unch menu changes twice a month.

"Our ambition was to conserve a traditional style of cooking," said Taittinger,
"while trying to evolve toward a more contemporary cooking." Some other offerings have been young rabbit on a bed of cabbage, lobster with caviar and sweetbreads and kidneys in puff pastry.

To attract a younger public, the 33-yearold chef, André Signoret, is trying slightly trendier cooking without succumbing fully to nouvelle cuisine.

The Taittingers, who own a hotel chain crowned by the deluxe Crillon in Paris, retain a sense of the restaurant's history. "We were entranced by the project because we're interested in everything that's part of the French heritage," Taittinger said. Several endearing quirks will remain. Unlike most Paris restaurants, the Grand Véfour serves copious portions. "It's better to leave food," Couranit said, "than to leave hungry." Champagne is served in carafes, with halves available. It is a special bottling for the restaurant, but it is not Taittinger.

The Associated Press NEW YORK — The stock market's bid to extend a brief upswing fell apart Thursday as prices tumbled in moderate trading. Retail.

The Associated Press auto, computer, drug and financial issues were among the major casualties.

24.383.220 51.363.870

The Dow Jones average of 30 industrials skidded 11.43 to 1.318.10, erasing most of its 17-point gain over the two previous sessions.

The Dow Jones transportation average, which had soared 16.50 points Wednesday, gave back 9.71 to 686.33.

Declines overall led advances by about 2-to-1 on the New York Stock Exchange, where the composite index lost 0.92 to 108.57, Volume totaled 90.60 million shares, against 94.88 million on Wednesday. Prices opened with a small gain but drifted into negative territory at midsession, with the slide gaining momentum in the final hour.

The moderate gains earlier this week had sparked debate on Wall Street as to whether the upturn, which was led by the blue chips and other market favorites, had staying power, Some observers said it appeared the so-called "secondary" stocks were joining with the large-capitalization issues in moving higher, which they considered a bullish sign.

But many analysts contended that the advance was little more than a technical rebound from the market's lackluster showing earlier this month, and that the raily would be short-lived because the broader market continued to appear weak.

"What we had over the prior two days was nothing more than an oversold, knee-jerk rally," asserted Alfred E. Goldman, vice president of A.G. Edwards & Sons in St. Louis. Even a die-remain frustrated that the economy has not yet shown signs of a substantial recovery from its sluggish performance in the first half of 1985, brokers said. They said there was additional concern after the Commerce Department reported that new

SCM rose 1% to 64% in heavy trading one day after receiving a $60-a-share takeover bid from the British company Hanson Trust PLC.

NEW YORK — The basic measure of the U.S. money supply, M-1, rose $900 million in the week ended Aug. 12, the Federal Reserve Board reported Thursday. The rise was within expectations.

The Fed said M-1, representing funds readily available for spending, rose to a seasonally adjusted $603.1 billion from a revised $602.2 billion the previous week. The previous week's figure originally was estimated at $601.9 billion. M-1 includes cash in circulation, deposits in checking accounts and nonbank travelers hard bull has to be disappointed that on only day three of an upward bounce, the market totally gave up the ship." In terms of business fundamentals, investors factory orders for durable goods fell 2.8 percent in July, the biggest drop since March. in a separate report, the Labor Department said consumer prices in July edged up 0.2 per-cent for the third consecutive month. Jack Eckerd jumped 4% to 30% and topped the NYSE's active list.

'Intelligent' New Products May Soon Help PC Users

By THOMAS C. HAYES

New York Times Service OS ANGELES — Personal computer users will be able to benefit soon from the artificial intelligence products being created now on more sophisticated and powerful

These products, unlike existing programs for personal computers, are supposed to be able to reason through a problem and provide possible solutions. Indeed, their biggest contribution may be to help define a problem.

At a conference here this week, Jane T. Malin, cognitive psychologist with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, showed how she and a colleague use Intellicorp's Knowl dozens of other items in the air-quality system. When the program pinpoints trouble, it automatically tests a variety of correc-

"It's a system that does the diagnosis, then keeps moving to make the system more correct even if it is not sure it knows the problem." Miss Malin said.

Miss Malin was attending the biennial International Joint Conference on Artificial Intelligence. The historically sleepy, esoteric gathering attracted 1,400 participants in 1981. This year the conference was expected to attract more than 10,000 people before its close Friday on the campus of the University of California at Los Angeles, with its attendance swelled by venture capitalists, investment bankers such as Goldman, Sachs & Co. and Morgan Stanley & Co. and legions of corporate executives and marketing personnel.

"Most of what we're seeing are tools that will enable us to build applications that people can use" on personal computers, said Esther Dyson, publisher of Computer Industry Daily. "For now, you can't run or create them on a personal computer. But they are clearly becoming commercial, and it's about time."

OHN A. Young, president and chief executive of Hewlett-Packard Co., said, "We believe we are on the edge of something very hig, with very important implications for our business and for our many customers." He said that with artificial intelligence development tools, "we think we have the beginnings of a solution to the software-productivity problem."

Hewlett-Packard, Digital Equipment, International Business Machines and General Electric were among the computer industry leaders that brought new products to the conference. Small start-up companies that beat the bigger companies to the marketplace with early products three and four years ago, also were here. They included Intellicorp, Teknowledge and the Carnegie Group. Intellicorp, which has been listed on the over-the-counter market since 1983, made its first profit during the last fiscal quarter, on sales of $3.4 million.

Many of the products are known as expert systems. They devise ways of collecting and organizing highly specialized information so that users can make quicker, more intelligent decisions. Scientists at Hewlett-Packard, who began work on artificial intelligence in 1981, have used expert systems designs to develop a training system for workers in the water-fabrication units of their semiconductor manufacturing division. The program runs

The system can recommend 120 steps for solving problems, and the number is expected to double soon. It includes 65 movies of how to conduct various tests; the films are stored on video rassettes and displayed on a computer screen by a research

Firm Cites Losses In EIS, U.S. Unit

By Juris Kaza

International Herald Tribune
STOCKHOLM — L.M. Ericsson, the Swedish telecommunications and electronics group, said Thursday that pretax earnings in the first half of 1985 dropped 31 percent from a year earlier, to 643.8 million kronor ($77.8 million) from 927.8 million.

The company predicted, however, that second-half earnings would improve somewhat" because of measures taken to improve the performance of unprofitable areas of operations.

It said that group sales in the half rose 12 percent from a year earlier. to 14.9 billion kronor from 13.328 billion, while order bookings were up 14 percent, to 16.2 billion kro-

Ericsson said the lower profits were the result of losses by its Ericsson Information Systems unit and its U.S. operations. U.S. subsidiaries, including Ericsson Inc., suffered losses chargeable to the group of 171 million kronor, it said. Brian Knox, a senior partner at London-based Grievson Grant & Co., said Ericsson's earnings for all of 1985 could be around 1.3 billion kronor, down from 1.569 billion in

Ericsson's interim report drew criticism from Swedish and inter-national analysts, who said the company had chosen a reporting method that hid a much sharper

British Firms Invade U.S. Capital Market

By James Sterngold
New York Times Service

NEW YORK - The British are coming to Wall Street. Aiming to mulate American brokerages and commercial banks that are firmly entrenched in the London financial market, merchant banks from Britain are scrambling to expand into the New York capital market. Robert Fleming Holdings Ltd., one of the largest merchant banks in London, announced 2½ weeks ago that it had agreed to buy F. Eberstadt & Co., a small, specialized Wall Street tesearch firm. Last month, S.G. Warburg, the venerable London firm, reorganized and widened its U.S. securities business.

And during the last few years other large British financial institutions - such as Kleinwort, Benson Ltd.; Mercantile House Holdings PLC, and J. Rothschild Holdings PLC - have begun building bases of operation in the United States.

"This is the largest capital market, and we felt it was essential to be here," said Ian Peacock, executive vice president of Kleinwort, Benson, which last year acquired ACLI Government Securities.

"Not to have a presence in New York is increasingly a disadvantage," added Iain Saunders, head of Fleming's New York subsidiary.

"That will only become more true."

Nonetheless, the forays by the British have thus far been less than a resounding success. These latest attempts to penetrate U.S. underwriting and brokerage businesses are not the first. Robert Fleming's acquisition of F. Eberstadt, for instance, was an eknowledgment of the troubles that Fleming had faced in trying to (Continued on Page 15, Col. 4)

Analysis noted, however, that the decline was skewed by a big drop in the volatile military-goods sector, and that too much significance should not be attached to any one month's number,

In a separate report, meanwhile the Labor Department said that inflation as measured by changes in consumer prices rose a modest 0.2 percent in July, identical to June and in line with expectations,

As measured by the Consumer Price Index, the department said, prices during the first seven months of the year have risen at an annual rate of 3.5 percent.

Analysis said the July number all but confirms predictions that U.S. inflation for 1985 could be the lowest in more a decade.

The Commerce Department said that orders for military equipment plunged 17.6 percent in July after gains of 26.3 percent in June and 43.1 percent in May, providing much of the strength in orders exhibited in those two months.

Excluding defense goods, new orders have increased on average only a slight 0.1 percent since the beginning of this year.

Orders for nondefense capital goods dropped 6.3 percent in July after a 9.4 percent June gain, the department said. This category is closely watched for indications of business plans to expand and modemize production facilities.

Laker Decision on Suit Clears Way for BA Sale

LONDON — Sir Freddie Lak-er's decision Wednesday to end a $1-billion antitrust suit against 10 of the world's major air carriers has cleared the way for a government sale of British Airways.

The state-owned airline announced Wednesday night that Sir Freddie had accepted $8 million and dropped all claims that BA and nine other major carriers plotted to bankrupt his cut-price trans-Atlantic airline that collapsed in 1982.

The settlement removes the last obstacle to a $48-million out-ofcourt settlement offered by the airlines in response to an antitrust suit brought by Laker Airways' liquidator three years ago seeking more than $1 billion in damages.

It also will enable Britain's Conservative government to fulfill its long-standing desire to transfer BA to private hands, a move considered a key part of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's privatization program but repeatedly held up by the litigation. BA, which handles more than 80 percent of the British international air-travel market, is expected to sell Sir Freddie, who originally termed the airlines' offer "pitifully inadequate," declined to comment on why he agreed to the settlement just a day after winning a two-week delay in a Jersey court.

But he told reporters he was "very pleased" with the settlement, adding: "I wish British Airways all the luck in the world."

BA, which Mrs. Thatcher wants to sell as part of her drive to reduce direct state involvement has recovered from near bankruptcy in 1982 to pretax profits of more than £200 million ($280 million) last year.

Sir Freddie, a colorful businessman knighted after bringing trans-Atlantic flights within the reach of budget travelers, had charged that the 10 airlines conspired to drive Laker Airways out of business by cutting their fares.

But RA, the main defendant in the lawsuit, said the settlement bears no admission of guilt on behalf of British Airways or the other defendants to drive Laker out

Other defendants included Pan American, Lufthansa, Swissair, SAS, British Caledonia and KLM.

Argentines Back Plan To Fight Hyperinflation

By Lydia Chavez

BUENOS AIRES - More than two months after President Raul Alfonsin introduced a bold and unexpected program to halt inflation, the majority of Argentines - worse off economically than they were the month before the plan was an-nounced - remain behind the govemment's effort.

This support, which has always been viewed as the key to the program's success, has been strong despite increased layoffs, tight credit, some food shortages and a continned fall in real wages.

To be sure, Peronist-led labor unions have attacked the plan and called for a general strike on Aug. 29. However, the number of work stoppages has actually decreased stoppages has actually decreased since the plan was announced, and many political leaders doubt there will be widespread compliance with the strike call. ### GDP of France Increased 0.6% In 2d Quarter

The Associated Press PARIS - France's gross domestic product rose a seasonally adjusted 0.6 percent in the second quarter of 1985 from the previous quarter, according to preliminary data released Thursday by the the National Statistics Institute.

GDP measures the total value of a nation's goods and services excluding income from foreign investments.

The government agency said the advance followed a decline of 0.3 percent in GDP for the first three months of 1985. For all of 1984, France's GDP expanded by 1.9 percent, and the government's goal for 1985 is a 1.6-percent growth rate.

The latest figures indicate that the government will have difficulty reaching its goal un-less the economy achieves a strong second half. confidence. If prices were to rise quickly it could be devastating, one economist said, since the price controis are the only real benefit felt by

The popular momentum is still behind the program, but the big problem they have is how to get out of these controls," said one foreign banker. "The important thing is that they are building a base that could be very positive."

In addition, business executives said, the government must continue to make structural changes in the large public sector, reducing its size and transferring more of the country's economy to the private

The government also has been helped on the revenue side by receiving an installment from the $1.4-billion standby losn from the International Monetary Fund. In addition it is near to closing on the $4.2-billion loan from its creditor

The banker and other Argentine usiness executives said, however, that there were signs the government was well aware of the steps it needed to take and was not depending on foreign loans or short-

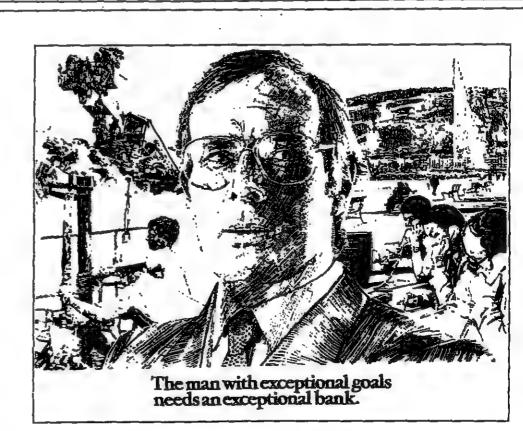

Rather than strongly criticizing the government, as business executives had done in the past, they expressed patience with the plan's progress. The government, they added, had kept its promise not to print money and had challenged the paternal relationship between the government and private enter-

"The government was financing and saving everyone to prevent bankruptcies and layoffs," said Alejandro Achaval, a senior executive of Garovaglio & Zorraquin, an Argentine conglomerate. "It has taken a lot of courage for the government to say that no more subsidies are going to be given away."

Another positive sign, business executives said, was the government's decision to pennit the stateowned company to sell crude oil rather than refined products. This alone could give the country a sub-stantial surplus in its trade balance for petroleum sales, they added.

In addition, private enterprise was given a potential boost when Juan Sourrouille, the minister of the economy, announced this month that export duties would be eliminated or reduced significantly. The government has traditionally depended on these duties for a

Phillips to Cut Exports Of Gas From North Sea

OSLO - Phillips Petroleum Co.'s subsidiary in Norway said Thursday that it has agreed to a 25percent cut in exports to Western Enropean gas suppliers from the North Sea Ekofisk oil and gas field to prevent further sinking of the seabed under the field.

A Phillips spokesman said the West German distribution utility, Ruhrgas AG, has agreed to the two-year reduction. Ruhrgas dis-ationies the gas to French, Dutch and Belgian suppliers.

The spokesman said it had not been necessary to impose force maeure, a legal term used to nullify contracts because of an "act of God," which would have discharged Phillips's legal responsibil-ity to maintain full supplies.

Gas and water are to be reinjected into the Ekofisk field, where continual extraction of oil and gas has weakened the underground chalk structure, causing the seabed and platforms on the field to sink as much as 6.9 feet (2.05 meters)

In practice the agreement means that the daily sales volume of about one billion cubic feet (28.3 million arbic meters) will be reduced by 200 million cubic feet, the spokesman said. The accord could be extended if a water-injection program

DUSSELDORF - Veba AG. West Germany's largest industrial group, said Thursday that consolidated group profit rose 11 percent in the first half, to 245 million Deutsche marks ($88.1 million) from 221 million DM a year earlier.

World group revenue rose far less, up 4 percent in the first half to 25.72 billion DM from 24.67 billion DM a year earlier. Rudolf von Bennigsen-Förder, Veba's managing board chairman, attributed the boost in earnings at the diversified energy conglomerate to improved results in the chemical and electricity divisions. Mr. Benningsen-Frder said he expects 1985 group net profit to exceed last year's record 696.9 million DM, which was up from 471.1 million DM in 1983.

He added that this year's dividend will be at least as high as last year's 9-DM payout. The 1984 dividend was raised from 7.50 DM in 1983. Mr. Benningsen-Förder empha-sized that other divisions such as transport and oil also contributed to the profit rise and noted that sales rose for all divisions.

Revlon Profit Potential Draws Unwanted Suitor

By Steven E. Prokesch New York Times Service

NEW YORK - After several years of lackluster earnings, Revion Inc., a company famous for making women look more glamorous, is beginning to look more alluring itself. So much so that it is having to light off a hostile suitor that has recognized something other investors had not: The cosmetics and health-care giant is worth far more than the stock market was reflect-giving them a total market value of $1.6 billion. The price of Revion common shares rose 87.5 cents Wednesday to $46.875 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Now, in offering $47.50 a share, or $1.8 billion, Pantry Pride Inc. appears to be hoping that it can make a quick killing. Sources close to Pantry Pride say it believes that Revion's disparate health-care operations - which last year generated 66 percent of Revion's operating profits of $298.3 million and 54 percent of its sales of $2.4 billion could be sold piecemeal for $1.5 billion. That would leave Pantry Pride with Revion's cosmetics and toiletries operations, believed by some analysts to be worth at least $700 million.

Revion's cosmetics business had been suffering from poor profitability, a dearth of new products and a loss of market share in several segments. But Pantry Pride's bid comes at a time when the unit, which still sells more makeup, fragrances and beauty aids through

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia Imagine a corporation wholly owned by committed Communist but run on the basis of unabashedly capitalist principles. Or conceptu alize a state-owned company in Africa that is lean, efficient and praised by its customers for its ex-

Sound improbable? Then picture a generally profitable company, with relatively well-paid workers, all of whom are citizens of the poorest nation in the world.

All three descriptions can be applied to Ethiopian Airlines, which many African officials hope will serve as a model, not only for a more flexible economic profile for Addis Ababa's rigid military regime, but also for other stateowned companies in neighboring countries.

Frequent travelers point to Ethiopian Airlines as the exception in Africa, where complaints abound about airline services. Confirmed reservations sometimes are not bonored, at least not without a substantial gratuity just prior to departure; flights may be delayed for hours or days; check-in counters often resemble a locked exit in a burning movie theater; passengers might have to make mad rushes across steaming runways in pursuit of too few seats; luggage may arrive at its destination lighter than it was when it was checked through; and safety records can make your spine

A recent letter from a Mr. A.G. Ringera to the editor of the Weekly Review of Kenya recounted an alltoo-typical tale of woe. On a Lagos to Narrobi flight aboard Nigerian Airways, Mr. Ringera was served crackers and soda for both lunch and dinner because, the flight at-tendant explained, the meals on board were "insufficient for everyone on the plane." Mr. Ringera said: "Believe it or not, a few minutes later the hostess and stewards were having complete meals right beside me." On Ethiopian Airlines, in contrast, nightmares of this sort are virtually unheard of.

Mohammed Ahmed, 53, general manager of Ethiopian Airlines, said the carrier is frequently called the best, most reliable airline in "In terms of safety and service we have competition in Europe and Asia," he said. "We have no competition in Africa." The reason can probably be found in the corporation's unusual history. Ethiopian Airlines was established 40 years ago this December with the government of Emperor Haile Selassic as the owner, but with Trans World Airlines as the completely autonomous operator.

Ethiopian Airlines: A Capitalistic Success Story That relationship continued un-til a year after the 1974 revolution that brought a Soviet-allied regime to power in Addis Ababa. Mr. Mohammed said, "At that time we told TWA they should stay. But they said 'you are grown children, you can stand on your own two feet."

The first few years did not go well. The staff swelled, with hiring based on who one knew rather than what one knew. Wasteful business practices became entrenched as the bottom line was eschewed in favor of the party line. Profits turned to losses and service suffered. In short, Ethiopian Airlines began to succumb to the same chronic ailments that now afflict so many Third World state-owned compa-

Dollar Rebounds to Close Higher in U.S.

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches NEW YORK - The dollar rebounded from 14-month lows set in Europe on Thursday to close higher against most major currencies in active U.S. trading. Traders said the sharp turnaround reflected technical short-covering when the dollar failed to fall through a key support level

Attention Focuses Again on Primary Market

By Christopher Pizzey

LONDON - Attention in the Eurobond market Thursday was again focused on the primary marset, with several new issues in a Fariety of currencies emerging,

Activity in the secondary market also picked up during the day and the dollar-straight sector generally closed with rises of % to % point while seasoned floating-rate notes were around 5 basis points higher, dealers added. Trading was quite active during the afternoon, with some signs that retail operators were beginning to re-enter the market, a trader said.

The expected $100-million convertible issue for Fuji Bank Ltd. emerged early in the morning as a two-tranche issue targeted separately at European and Asian, including Middle Eastern, investors.

Experts From Private Sector To Meet on Eureka Funds

BONN — Financial experts from private industry in 17 West European countries were expected to meet in London next month to discuss ways of financing Europe's Eureka high-technology project, sources in Bonn said Thursday. The sources said the British government had proposed the conference as a means of gauging the extent of financial support from private industry for the project, initiated by France with strong West German back-

Foreign Minister Hans-Die-trich Genscher of West Germa-ny and the French external affairs minister, Roland Dumas, discussed the proposal at a meeting in Bonn on Wednesday night and agreed to support it, the sources added. Eureka, a civilian program, is intended to help Western Europe keep pace with technological advances in Japan and the United States. The governments of the 17 countries gave it the political clearance at a ministerial conference in Paris in

The sources said Britain had yet to issue formal invitations to the conference or name a date. But they said that it was expected to take place in London in mid-September and that it signaled growing British interest in the Eureka program.

S OME of us can remember covering events at the National Press Club in Washington from a sort of balcony purdah, high above the ballroom, watching as the male reporters ate lunch. The day a cheeky friend and I brought snacks, we were banished to the back stairs. We wouldn't have dared to ask for equal pay in these words are the same than the present the same was the same than the same those days. If we were caught doing men's work, we might be busted back to the typing pool where we belonged.

For women like us, the idea of an master's in business administration from Harvard Business School was too farfetched even to contemplate. We watch in wonder as young women doctors, lawyers and reporters earn more in their first jobs than we ever made in our lives, complaining all the while that they're still not getting their due.

For women like us, "Women Like Us," a study of 82 of the 88 women who enrolled at Harvard Business School in the autumn of 1973, brings discouraging news: The problem, it seems, is men.

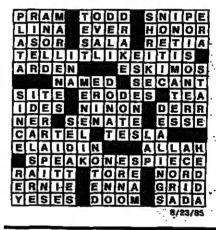

We'd had intimations as we followed the tale of Mary Cunningham, class of '79, and William Agee, class of '63, the Héloise and Abélard of the Bendix boardroom. But one assumed that their case was unique.

The profiles that unfold in these pages show that, while the words may differ, the music is the same: A woman may have an MBA from the most prestigious business school in the country, but cast her loose in the corporate jungle and she's Tess of the d'Urbervilles. It could be grounds for a curriculum change at Harvard

For "Mary Pat" (all have imaginary names, we're assured), disaster struck before she even got her degree: A dashing fellow student spent the night, then told her to get lost. She was so devastated she could hardly finish the crucial assignment due the next day, and she seems to have been drawn ever after into mistake after mistake in her business and personal lives. Phoebe," attractive and vivacious, is persuaded to enroll at Harvard by her South American boyfriend, who later marries her, and beats her so badly that she shows up late for work.

"Tess" had been jilted by a lover and turned down for a stewardess job by five airlines before she read "Sex and the Single Girl" by Helen Gurley Brown - five times - and got a grip on herself. By the time she enrolled at Harvard, she had found a husband and a good job. She got bad grades, and when she turned to the business school psychologist for help, he advised her to wiggle her toes to relax. She dropped out for a term to plant pachysandra in the yard but came back to finish her degree pregnant, with her husband refusing to let her have an abortion. She landed a good job where she was paid more than her husband, who confides to the author that their sex life is a mess. Next "Tess" was fired from her job, but mess. Next "Tess" was fired from her job, but mess. Next "Tess" was lifed from her joo. but soon found another, paying $60,000 a year. She has decided to go into therapy and is feeling "a strong physical attraction" for the corporate recruiter who found her her job. Clearly the gods will have more sport with "Tess" and "Martha" and "Holly" and all the rest down the road. the road.

Solution to Previous Puzzle

Sex is not the only weapon in this war. "Suzanne," the one woman among the 82 who personities for the author what it takes to reach the top — no personal involvements, a single of the surface of t minded obsession with work - faces the ageold differences that won't go away. Discussing a man she has recently hired, she reflects: "I began to realize that he expects to have continued promotions. . He is so self-confident and so unhumble that it surprises me. . . I don't dare ask for something more until I feel sure they can't say no. And that in a way sure they can't say no. And that in a way wornes me about getting into senior management. Because I don't believe it's my birthright." For six years, Suzame had been a pediatric muse; she had signed on at Harvard after being rejected for a job by a Boston bank because she couldn't type.

Despite its absorbing material, this book is tiresome to read. The author, a former Wall Street Journal reporter, tends to turn her tape recorder on and forcet to turn it off, even when recorder on and forget to turn it off, even when she's talking to herself. (She has had problems, too.) The dialogues tend to sound like a Tup-too.) The dialogues tend to sound like a Tup-perware party or an all-girl luncheon at Schrafft's. She interviews six key graduates twice—briefly at the beginning of the book in deeper detail later — which makes it hard to keep people straight. She also skips back and forth within the interviews to interview others about the research she's interviews and interabout the person she's interviewing, and interjecting her reactions to what is being said. The whole works could have used some sharp hears and another trip through the typewriter

Guerrero's Rise From 'Nothing' to Infinity

PHILADELPHIA — Even in a complex age we still sometimes meet a man as simple and hard as the poverty that made him.

Guerrero means "warrior," and that's close enough. When you are born poor in San Pedro Macoris in the Dominican Republic, you tight upward or you sink down. You succeed or you cut cane for a lifetime.

"I always know I am going to make it in the major leagues someday, says Pedro Guerrero, who signed a pro contract at 16 and this year, at 29, may be the most valuable player in the National League.

Why? The words come from handsome, smooth, implacable face: "Because I could not go back. There was nothing."

Twenty years ago, Manny Mota of the Los Angeles Dodgers played winter ball in his native Dominican Republic. To the children who swarmed around him he threw coins. Now the children of San Pedro de Macoris have grown up. A down are in the majors, among them Joaquin Andujar, George Bell, Tony Fernandez, Julio Franco, Alfredo Griffin and Juan Samuel We cannot know how many children, like

Looking at Guerrero's 326 batting average, his 29 home runs, his 73 runs batted in and his five-year, $7 million contract, many call his a success story. Guerrero knows better. He goes back to San Pedro de Macoris every winter. The poor come to him, a steady stream it sometimes seems. To beg.

"I can't find a way to say no," he says. "They know I am rich. And I know how poor they are: They come to my house, stop me on the street. I'm a real soft touch. I don't think that's bad. They all tell a story, About their mother or... child who is sick. I know some are lying, just to get the money. Just like anywhere else - good people, bad people. Some are the ones who boo

'Hi, Sucker, Let's Deal'

By Russell Baker N EW YORK — There is one of those commercials that car dealers pay to these stations to run after midnight. It shows 20 acres of cars surrounding a hyperthyroid man who looks as if his name is

You can tell he was voted most likely to succeed in high school 17 years ago, and he has obviously fulfilled the prophecy because he owns 20 car-covered acres and stars in his own TV commercial.

Phil strides from car to car, waving his hands and talking a mile a minute, never looking at where he's going, but staring straight into the mera and, amazingly, never colliding with any of his cars.

I have seen other dynamic men. especially Lee lacocca, walk through densely cluttered areas on TV commercials, talking endlessly right into the camera without ever hitting anything, and I am envious of their skill at getting through commercials unbruised. I have trouble getting through open door-ways without banging an elbow. The sureness with which Phil glides among those cars without once bumping a thigh does nothing to put me at ease about him. Has he made a bargain with Satan: his soul in trade for this astonishing TV

Normally, I wouldn't care. For years I have been watching Phil's late-night car-sale commercials, as well as Ken's, Sam's, Harry's and

"My poor fellow man" — that is what these commercials have made me say in the past - "with his witless insistence on buying cars, he will soon be again in the clutches of Ken, Sam, Harry or Bill," Now, however, life has presented me with a miserable circumstance. After all these years of having a subway at my beck and call, I am finally compelled to buy a car of my own. Hence my morbid concentration on Phil's dashing around on denting a fender.

his 20 acres of cars without once Ah, he'll find me an easy mark, young Phil will. Can you believe what he is now saying? "Ready to deal!" he is shouting. "We are ready to deal! Ready to deal like no dealer has ever dealed before." "Dealt before," I say to the TV set. "The past tense of 'deal' is

Is that a wink Phil is giving the rest of the TV audience? Of course. Sly devil. Having discovered my weakness - having exposed me as a pedantic lint-picker about points handle me when I come in. "Ain't it a nice day?" he'll cry, so that I will get too prissy about grammar, saying, "Ain't' is incor-rect, sir," to notice Phil adding vinylized mink seat covers to the op-tional equipment being loaded on the car he intends to sell me.

Sitting there before the TV, watching Phil move so dynamically, I am engulfed by self-pity.

Come in and make a deal? In the awful post-midnight light of the TV tube, it is all too clear how pathetic my amateur efforts to make a deal will look when Phil raises the hoods from his eyes to see whether I'm the sort of sap who will take the custom-made hubcaps and the horn that plays the first 13 notes of

Me make a deal with Phil? Lyndon Johnson might have been an equal match at dealing, but I'll bet Phil would have come out of it with a federal judgeship for his brother-

I know people, mostly men, who boast they have made deals with Phil that made Phil weep and beg them not to take the bread from his children's months. These are men with no sense of reality. Phil did not acquire 20 acres of cars and power to disturb the peace of 100,000 parlors after midnight by granting boons to gullible human-

I sit here watching Phil, "Come in and let me make you happy," he pleads, "Very, very happy." It is bloodcurdling, for I will have to face him any day now, and it will not help to level with him, to say, "Phil, it would be useless for a dolt like me to try to deal with - "

Because he will say: "Deal, old buddy? You've come to the right place. Have you seen the new vinylized mink seat covers and -?"

Safe: I think, to phone up and say, "Just send over the car of your choice, Phil, and leave it at the curb, and I'll put the check in the mail." That way you don't have to see him sneering at you.

When 12 warrold Sareh - When 13-year-old Sarah Ann Rairdon disappeared in May, the people of Underwood rallied together to search for her and comfort her family. When her body was found seven weeks later, they mourned together.

Afterward, with her father, John Albert Rairdon, they orga-nized to help missing children. Rairdon was chosen to lead the

But earlier this month the unfothomable happened: Rairdon, a 38-year-old mechanic, confessed, according to the police, that he had killed Sarah as she fought off his sexual advances. He told the authorities that he had been sexually abusing her for Underwood, a western Minnesota town of about 330 people where serious crime is almost unknown, is full of bewilderment and bitterness.

The tragedy, many people say, is that despite all the attention that has been paid to sexual abuse of children in recent years, Sarah apparently had not confided in

John Klinnert, the high school principal, said that after her disappearance three days before the school term ended, he found a note in a book in her locker that said: "Please, please don't kill me. Don't hurt me. I want to

According to the report, John Rairdon said he took an awl from his truck and stabbed her in the abdomen. Then, he said, he struck her and watched as she bled profusely. The report said he hid the body in a barn and went back later that evening to dispose of it in a field several miles away.

The word soon spread that Sarah was missing, and, that night, neighbors began searching for Kolstad and other Sunday school teachers in the Rairdons congregation at Sverdrup Lutheran Church organized volunteers who prepared meals for the Rair-dons for the next two weeks. The church people had 2,500 fliers printed, and about 100 to 200 people, including vacationers in the area, helped stuff and address envelopes at the American Legion Hall and the school. Later, the volunteers raised

$6,000 for a reward. Then came the arrest. Since then, despite their mixed feelings, people have not abandoned Marilyn Rairdon and her children. They bring meals, run errands, do the laundry.

"The real danger," the Rever-end Roll P. Wangberg, paster of the Lutheran church, said of Rairdon, "is that we will cast him off and say, This guy is different, and not realize that maybe any one of us, in the right circum to resist his advances. On May 19, stances, has the potential to have that same flaw."
